The farmer should first of all have legislative encouragement. He is the Atlas on whose shoulders rests the entire burden of food production. He is the bed rock of the productive world and never strikes. He rises with the dawn and ceases from work in crop season only when darkness falls. Without his labor food production would fail, famine would stalk abroad in the land, and this Republic would cease to be even a memory. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, were points of order reserved on this bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the coming fiscal year and not for this fiscal year. The Committee on Appropriations would have jurisdiction. I do not think I need amplify what I call attention to now. The point of order runs to the "immediately available" part of the bill as reported and then as it is stated in the amendment, too.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order to the bill itself comes too late, and certainly this amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] makes a point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] on the ground that it amends a provision of the bill which makes a part of the sum immediately available. The Chair would state that if the point of order had been made to the language of the paragraph as read it would have been subject to a point of order, and the point of order would have been sustained. But the Chair thinks that, no point of order having been made to the language of the paragraph, it is in order to amend it by a germane amendment. The Chair thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is germane to the provisions of the paragraph and not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CANNON. That is to say, you can by amendment make the whole of the $125,000 immediately available?

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order having been made to the language of the bill as reported, yes.

Mr. CANNON. You could make it a billion dollars, written in here by way of amendment, and it would not be subject to a point of order because of the $25,000 in the bill as reported?

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. The Chair is compelled to overrule the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I am not sure but that the Chair is right.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a tobacco district, and with a full realization of the importance of this subject, I wish to corroborate all that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] has said in relation to tobacco worms, as the bane of the tobacco planter. The worming of tobacco is one of the most tedious, laborious, and dirty jobs on the farm. From the time that the worms first appear, down to the time that the tobacco is cut, they are always with the tobacco grower, though more abundant at two periods in the growth of the crop than at other times. Even when the farmer has cut his tobacco and hung it in the barn he finds as soon as heat is applied that the barn floor is littered with great worms that have been overlooked by the pickers.

We are all keen on the subject of economy, but I do not think there is any economy in cutting off or reducing investigations which have such potentialities as these investigations of subjects related to agriculture that are authorized by this bill. What would be the condition of the Irish-potato industry to-day if the potato raisers had not learned to treat the potato bug by the application of paris green to the growing plants? The effort has been made by the Agricultural Department to discover some method equally as efficient for the destruction of the tobacco worm as Paris green has proved to be for the destruction of the potato bug. Two or three insecticides have been tried out by the department in these experiments. They have experimented with Paris green and with arsenate of lead, and as a result of these experiments have ascertained that perhaps arsenate of lead in dry form is the most effective insecticide for the destruction of tobacco worms.

What is now needed, as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], is the ascertainment of the proper frequency of application and the discovery of an efficient, foolproof machine for dusting the plants with this powder. If some method of destroying tobacco worms by poisoning, as efficient as the destruction of the potato bug by Paris green, is perfected and put into use, it will be difficult to appraise the importance of this discovery in the conservation of labor on the tobacco farms.

The department believes that the progress already made is sufficiently encouraging to justify it in asking for an increase in this appropriation. As I have said, if only they can work out what they have in mind to do, namely, an approved device for applying the powdered arsenate, and the proper frequency of application, then they will have solved a problem of the very greatest importance to the tobacco raisers and the tobacco consumers, as well as to the general public. Such a discovery put into universal use would free a very great amount of labor for more productive work.

That is the situation, Mr. Chairman; and the amount that is asked for, having in mind the value of this crop, is very small. The objection that a completely satisfactory result has not already been secured, if offered as a reason why we should abandon this experiment, is wholly illogical.

As I said in a recent colloquy with a gentleman on this floor, the destruction caused by the cotton-boll weevil in the South has been enormous. The department has been working for years to find some method of exterminating or controlling the boll weevil. So far they have not afforded a complete solution. Indeed, they have not discovered any method of substantially combating this pest.

This destructive insect is marching on, gaining ground every year. But bearing in mind his destructiveness, bearing in mind what it will mean to this country and to the world should the scientific inquirers now at work devise some method of effectually dealing with this mischief, do the members of this committee consider that it would be wise policy to abandon our efforts to combat this menace to one of the most important crops in the field of agriculture?

Some years ago the peach and apple orchards of this country were ravaged by a bug that was brought into the United States from China. Science for a time was unable to afford a remedy, and in my State and other States whenever orchards became infested with this bug, under advice from the experts these orchards were cut down and burned. But the efforts to discover an effective remedy for this imported pest were not relaxed. Finally the appropriate treatment was afforded in the lime-sulphur spray and this particular mischief is now under control. If the task of working out a remedy for this trouble had been abandoned as hopeless, orchard values in the United States would have been reduced to an extent running into hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I am familiar with the ravages of the tobacco worm. The department estimated that $8,000 would be required. Does the gentleman think that it is necessary to increase the amount by $15,000 when the department estimates an increase of $8,000?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will not suggest that you increase anything over what the department has asked for in this connection.

Mr. HAUGEN. The department estimated $8,000. This item, as a whole, carries an increase of $24,600 over the appropriation for the current year.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I did not gather that from the statement read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] have very fully discussed this amendment, which is of very great importance, particularly to tobacco growers. As the gentleman from Kentucky stated, some years ago the Department of Agriculture established an experimental station at Clarksville, Tenn., in the district that I have the honor to represent, for the purpose of investigation and experiment as to the most effective method for the destruction of the tobacco worm. Prior to that time the farmers had commenced to use Paris green to destroy the worm. But it was found to be of very uncertain value, because when applied it often burned and destroyed a portion of the plant, and it was difficult to apply it in the proper proportion and at the proper time so as to destroy the worm and not injure the plant.

Realizing this, Congress made an appropriation, and the Department of Agriculture thought it of sufficient importance to establish this experimental station. After some years of investigation Prof. Morgan has discovered a remedy which, if properly applied, will absolutely do the work and which will not injure the tobacco plant; that is arsenate of lead, to which gentlemen have referred. The department has discovered this remedy. Congress has appropriated from time to time each year a few thousand dollars to enable the remedy to be discovered. All we want and all the department wants is an opportunity to demonstrate to tobacco growers that this is a practical remedy and show them how it should be applied. It seems to me that when you take into consideration the value of the crop, and what it means to the tobacco grower, that $15,000 which is required is a very small sum indeed. It would seem to be very poor business for Congress to make an appropriation to find a remedy and then after discovering it fail to make a demonstration to show how it should be applied and how to best realize the results desired. I hope in view of these facts that the committee will see fit to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to say that the appropriation for the current year is $100,400, and the committee reports in this bill $125,000, which is an increase of $24,600. The department has asked for $8,000 for this purpose, and we have allowed that amount estimated by the department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman this question. I understood that those in charge of this work asked for a greater sum, and insisted that the sum of $8,000 would by no means be sufficient to carry on demonstration work. The gentleman from Kentucky read a letter from Dr. Hunter, who is in charge of the work, who stated that $15,000 was necessary. If they are expected to demonstrate the usefulness of this remedy, they ought to have sufficient money with which to do it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have not had my attention called to it. Is that a supplemental estimate?

Mr. THOMAS. I read from a letter from Dr. Hunter.

Mr. HAUGEN. I was out of the Chamber at the time and did not hear the gentleman's letter read.

Mr. THOMAS. He said that $15,000 was necessary. That is the statement of Dr. W. D. Hunter.

Mr. HAUGEN. The usual way is to submit the estimates through the Secretary. I had no knowledge of it myself. I do not question the gentleman's statement. The fact remains that the committee has recommended an increase of $24,600.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to modify my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN of Illinois). The gentleman from Kentucky asks leave to modify his amendment in the manner which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 56, line 21, after the word "and," strike out the balance of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof: "$140,000, of which sum $67,000 shall be immediately available, $42,000 of which shall be used for investigation and work in connection with the control of insects and worms injurious to tobacco."

Mr. HAUGEN. I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that the Chairman has ruled that the amendment is in order. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky to modify his amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. I shall have to object, as I understand it increases the amount.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, an appropriation for these lines of work has been carried for a number of years. Last year there was an increase over the previous year of about $10,000, bringing it up to $100,400. This year the committee recommends that it be further increased to $125,000. That will be a growth in less than 10 years from $50,000, at which figure it was carried for some time, to $125,000. It would seem to the committee that that will provide for reasonable extension of the work.

I have no objection. I have never heard any objection raised in the Committee on Agriculture to all kinds of experiments and investigations nor to a reasonable amount of demonstration. I realize that they are the important duties of the department; but there is, I believe, ground for criticism of the department going out and doing a lot of manual labor in connection with its demonstrations. The demonstrations the gentleman speaks of will involve the performance of a great deal of labor. Evidently the investigations have been concluded, experiments have been successful, and the department has determined that a certain remedy which it has worked out and tried out, if properly applied, will be effective.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Under this paragraph did not the department ask for $178,000?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS. And the committee cut it down to $125,000?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS. And you have cut the tobacco appropriation in that proportion?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; we have not cut the tobacco appropriation; the total of the appropriation for all lines of work is increased $25,000 over last year, $75,000 over about five years ago. The entire amount or any part of it can be used in such lines of work as the department wishes to carry out.

Now, I wish to submit a word in regard to some lines of work the department does. I repeat I think the department ought to experiment, investigate to the limit, in order to find causes of trouble and remedies for it if possible, and to a certain extent demonstrate the proper manner of applying the remedies; but it seems to me the extent to which the department has gone and is inclined to go in some of its demonstrations is not wise or proper. I might particularize and give instances and examples of the manner and extent of this bureau's far-reaching work, extending, I mean, to the doing of an immense amount of physical labor in carrying its demonstrations to the people, but I do not wish to say anything by way of seriously reflecting on the officers of the bureau. It is one of the great bureaus of the department, a highly scientific bureau, and I have confidence in its officials and appreciate it may be presumptuous of me to be very critical. I shall confine myself to making a protest—I have expressed myself before quite vigorously to the same effect—and say that demonstration involving large physical labor can not be expected of this scientific bureau, nor should it be permitted even if the bureau people wish to do it.

Take some of this work that is to be done and proposed in Kentucky. This infestation has been prevalent in that State a long time; tobacco is one of their great crops, but I have not learned that the Legislature of the State of Kentucky has ever appropriated a dollar to assist in this kind of work. It had done nothing for its own people. They come to the Federal Government, perhaps properly so, to have these experiments and investigations made. The department has determined a remedy and how to apply it. It requires simply physical labor. Are you going to employ men, as were employed to go around with scissors cutting weeds in an attempt to exterminate the corn borer, or as you employed 500 men to go out and cut brush to destroy and prevent the spread of gypsy moths and brown-tail moths? Are you going to hire men to go out into the tobacco fields and apply the remedy, easy of application, one that the department has worked out? In my humble judgment we are carrying these paternalistic policies to a ridiculous extent. It seems to me that in this particular matter we have appropriated money enough, and if the people themselves will help a little, supply a little money and be willing to do some of their own work, it will not be necessary for the Federal Government to appropriate so much. The appropriation was increased in 1919 from $89,400 to $100,400. This year it is to be $125,000 if the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture is approved by the House. It seems to me that that increase is enough, and every dollar of it, if the department so determines, is available for the particular work in which gentlemen from Kentucky seem to be so much interested. I trust the increase involved in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky will not be agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment to strike out the figures "$140,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$100,400," and to strike out "$67,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS by striking out "$140,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,400," and striking out the figures "$67,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, everyone on the floor of this House is talking about economy, but he wants that economy to apply to some one else rather than himself. I do not want to cut down appropriations so that it will cripple any department of the Government. I want them to have enough money to go along and function and do what is reasonably expected of them. Last year for this service we appropriated $100,400. There is no reason in the world why there should be any more money for this service this year than last. If we are going to practice economy in this House, which we talk so much about, I think now is the time to show whether the Members of the House want the economy or not. It certainly will not cripple the work if we give them the same amount of money that they had last year, and that is what is provided for in my amendment. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana rose.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then I move that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that debate upon the pending amendment and all amendments thereto now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILSON of Louisiana), there were—ayes 65, noes 18.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Inasmuch as there was objection made to the modification proposed by my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], if the substance of that modification were in the way of a substitute would it be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in order. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection, I would like to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the Thomas amendment and the Snell amendment to the Thomas amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the objection to the modification of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS]. Of course, it is not the duty of the Chair to do so. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is to insert after the language "of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available" a provision making $67,000 immediately available. If the gentleman from Kentucky wishes to modify his amendment, therefore, it will strike out the language "of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available" in the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then nothing will be immediately available.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not duplicate the item.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa wish to object to the modification?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky for the modification of his amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky as modified, and then the amendment to that amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. THOMAS: Page 58, line 21, after the word "ant," strike out the balance of the paragraph and insert: "$140,000, of which sum $67,000 shall be immediately available, $42,000 of which shall be used for investigations and work in connection with the control of insects and worms injurious to tobacco."

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. SNELL: Strike out "$140,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,400," and strike out "$67,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. THOMAS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 62.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. SNELL and Mr. THOMAS took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 69.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WALSH). The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No. The gentleman can do as he pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, debate was closed on this proposition. If the gentleman is going to debate it, I would be inclined to object. If it is on any other subject, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that was just agreed to, to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], strikes out $67,000 and inserts $25,000, and then leaves in $42,000 without being changed. Now, what the gentleman in charge of the bill wants to do about it I do not know, but it will not make sense if the amendment should be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SNELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, that in line 21, page 58, in place of the figures "$125,000" insert "$101,000," and cut out the balance of that section down to and including line 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNELL: Page 58, line 21, strike out "$125,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$101,000," and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that debate was closed on the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I understood the debate was closed——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood, although not occupying the chair at the time, that the debate was closed by motion on the paragraph and all amendments thereto. If the Chair is misinformed, he will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to correct him.

Mr. HAUGEN. The debate was closed. I made the motion, and it was carried.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I understood it was on the Thomas amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. And all amendments thereto.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important item. I have not occupied any of the time of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAYTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RUBEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting forests, $40,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have made this motion for the purpose of calling to the attention of the committee a rather sensational story that has appeared in to-day's issue of the Washington Times and, I am informed, other papers, and which has also been called to the attention of the Members of Congress by telegrams received from the city editor of the New York American, with reference to the proposed sale by the Shipping Board to foreign interests of the German passenger vessels which became our prize as the result of the war.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am forced to make the point of order that the gentleman is speaking out of order and not speaking on the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. We have a great deal more of this bill to consider.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this is of great interest to the whole country, there ought to be some statement made about it. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may proceed for five minutes out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Let him extend his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] may proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, we have a great deal more of this Agricultural bill to consider. I shall not object to the gentleman extending his remarks.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is in order.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, when we should reach the section of the bill concerning the Bureau of Biological Survey I had desired to submit some remarks, but as it is apparent that we shall not reach that part of the bill this afternoon and not before to-morrow, and I shall not be able to be in the Chamber to-morrow, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on that part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on a subsequent paragraph of the bill at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman—and I do not want to object—I will not be here to-morrow either, and I am very anxious to offer an amendment to the next section of the bill.

Mr. SMALL. I do not expect to ask for any extension of time, only for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will not object to that, but I will object to anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

[Mr. SMALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall not ask for further time, but I do ask for leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, including insects affecting the potato, sugar beet, cabbage, onion, tomato, beans, peas, etc., and insects affecting stored products, $110,000.

By unanimous consent, Mr. EVANS of Montana and Mr. SMITH of Idaho obtained leave to revise and extend their remarks.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 59, line 3, after the word "products" strike out the figures "$110,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$131,760."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, last year this bill carried for this purpose $134,960. The estimates for this year are $131,760. I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman has my undivided attention.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understood the chairman of the committee to say a while ago, in debating an amendment offered here, that the committee and the House ought to stand by the estimates of the department. I now appeal to the chairman of this committee to stand by his own proposition. I agreed with him fully in his remarks on that subject, and I hope my friend will be perfectly and absolutely consistent, as he generally is, and vote with me for this amendment, because this is the exact estimate of the department. I would like to know upon what theory the committee have cut out this amount of $21,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. I regret that the Committee of the Whole did not follow my suggestion that the estimates made by the department be used as a guide in determining the amount of these appropriations.

The Committee on Agriculture have given careful consideration to every estimate made by the department and have not gone beyond those estimates, but the Committee of the Whole have gone beyond them. On this item, as on all the other items, we think we have been very liberal in the amounts which we have reported to the House.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want the gentleman to stand by his statement that he is going to be governed by the experts in the department. I call attention to a telegram which I have received from the head of the plant bureau in my State. Something has been said about the appropriation for citrus canker in Florida. I want to say that the State of Florida matched dollar for dollar with the Federal Government in the eradication of citrus canker. This insect is destroying the sweet-potato industry in a number of States. The State of Florida is appropriating money along with the General Government to deal with this insect, which threatens to destroy this great food product. I undertake to say that there was not a scintilla of evidence before the committee to justify them in cutting down this estimate of the department $21,760. The amount asked by the department for the coming year for this purpose was $3,200 below the amount carried by the bill last year.

Mr. Chairman, my friend from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] insisted before this committee a few moments ago that we had no other means of knowledge except what the experts said, and in his testimony before the committee Dr. Howard insisted upon this full amount. Yet the committee, who admit that they are not experts and that they know nothing about the needs of this proposition except as they get it from the department, have cut down the estimate of the department by $21,760. I would like to know from the chairman of the committee upon what theory they did it and what evidence was before them that warranted their action in thus seriously injuring the great food crops of sweet potatoes, sugar beets, cabbage, and so forth?

I ask that this telegram may be read, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the telegram will be read in the gentleman's time.

GAINESVILLE, FLA., February 11, 1920.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

House Agricultural Committee has cut item for food truck inspection investigation, Bureau of Entomology, twenty-one thousand below Secretary of Agriculture request, which was same as amount appropriated last year. Unless restored to original amount requested by Secretary, department will be unable to continue cooperating with us eradicating sweet-potato weevil. Several thousand already expended from State and Federal fund will be lost. Eradicating work very successful. Please try to get amount restored. Letter follows.

WILMON NEWELL.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say that this is no time to be cutting down appropriations for the increase of food products, in my opinion. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's question, I desire to say that a situation created by the gentleman and his colleagues on that side has made it necessary to reduce the estimates.

I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK of Florida) there were—ayes 36, noes 70.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Total for Bureau of Biological Survey, $782,170.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think I will have to reserve a point of order on all this legislation that the Clerk has been reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has concluded the reading of the paragraphs to which the gentleman refers and has gone beyond them.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is too late to make the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I was sitting here following the reading, and the Clerk seemed to be reading it all as one paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read three paragraphs beyond the point to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not raise any parliamentary question about it. I was simply waiting for the Clerk to get to a stopping point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF ACCOUNTS AND DISBURSEMENTS.

Salaries, Division of Accounts and Disbursements: One chief of division and disbursing clerk, $4,000; 1 supervising auditor, $2,250; 1 cashier and chief clerk, $2,250; 1 deputy disbursing clerk, $2,000; 1 accountant and bookkeeper, $2,000; 2 clerks, class 4; 4 clerks, class 3; 6 clerks, class 2; 10 clerks, class 1; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger, $720; 1 messenger boy, $600.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 65, line 7, strike out "10 clerks, class 1," and insert "12 clerks, class 1."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this is an increase of two clerks, class 1, for the Division of Accounts. The expenditures for the Department of Agriculture this year are around $140,000,000. I believe the chief of this division is entitled to the two additional clerks. The committee did not authorize this amendment, but I believe the members of the committee are agreeable to this increase. I am informed that the clerks are urgently needed. However, I desire to state that this amendment does not come as a request from anyone connected with the department nor is this action known to anyone in the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, telegraph and telephone service, freight and express charges, and all other necessary miscellaneous administrative expenses, $25,480.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether this amount is a reduction of the amount heretofore carried for this purpose; and if so, to what extent.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no reduction under the current year in the paragraph just read. The committee recommends in the first paragraph new language, which will permit the crop estimating to be carried on in cooperation with the States Relations Service. In that way it will be possible to utilize the county agents in making the estimates. The committee believes that it will improve the service. It is the thought of the committee that the county agents are well equipped and qualified to furnish the information, and that the estimating will be better conducted in that way than heretofore.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. How much does this reduce the appropriation that we have heretofore had?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will tell the gentleman. It was $48,246 as compared with the appropriation for the current year, and $644,926 as compared with the estimates of the department.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to have something to say on this line, and I will yield the floor for the present and let the information be given, and then I will ask for recognition.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for the current year for the paragraph just read—that is, for expenses in Washington—is the same as is carried in this bill, but for field expenses the appropriation for the current year is $216,562, a total for the two of $242,042. The estimates for the two paragraphs was $793,043. The committee reports $25,480 for expenses in Washington and $168,076 for expenses in the field, a total of $193,556 for the two paragraphs, which is a reduction of $48,486 under the current year and $599,487 under the estimates.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a new shift, and I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Butler	Cole	Dunbar
Ashbrook	Caldwell	Cooper	Dunn
Barkley	Campbell, Kans.	Costello	Dyer

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 12272, had found itself without a quorum; that he had caused the roll to be called; that 255 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he handed in the list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I want to offer an amendment, in good faith.

Mr. HAUGEN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Five minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to have five minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. I want five minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. The gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the gentleman is seeking to close debate upon this important proposition in 10 minutes?

Mr. HAUGEN. I propose that we are going to pass this bill, if there is any show of doing so. We have fooled away a whole day as it is.

Mr. RUBEY. I am glad to cooperate with the gentleman in passing the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion, that debate upon the paragraph close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate close in 10 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri moves an amendment that all debate close in 30 minutes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY) there were—ayes 57, noes 108.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. RUBEY to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 109.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to close debate in 10 minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion by making it 25 minutes.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that, having just gotten through voting on an amendment to close debate in 30 minutes, the amendment of the gentleman now to close debate in 25 minutes is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment to close debate in 25 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY) there were—ayes 33, noes 81.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. RUBEY to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to close debate in 10 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by closing debate now.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, this is an important matter, and I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY) there were—ayes 44, noes 83.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. RUBEY to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 81.

So the motion to rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move a substitute for the original motion, that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a motion by way of substitute that debate close in 15 minutes. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is, in effect, an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The original motion provides for closing debate in 10 minutes, and the amendment to that motion provides for closing debate immediately. There can be a motion offered by way of a substitute to the original motion, which the gentleman has done. The question is on closing debate in 15 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY) there were—ayes 31, noes 87.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. RUBEY to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 83.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, a point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, this proposition has not been debated at all, and therefore it is not in order to move to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota that debate be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON and Mr. RUBEY) there were—ayes 76, noes 41.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I very respectfully ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. RUBEY took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 32.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee proceeded to divide.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. RUBEY took their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 32.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has terminated on the paragraph and amendments thereto.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia took their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 90.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. RUBEY. On page 68, line 25, I move to amend by striking out "$25,480" and inserting "$30,000."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait until the amendment is reported. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment by Mr. RUBEY: Page 68, line 21, strike out "$25,480" and insert in lieu thereof "$30,000."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute to strike out "$30,000" and substitute "$20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment in the way of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for Mr. RUBEY's amendment: Strike out "$30,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is an amendment in the third degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], and make it "$40,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is only one amendment pending. The gentleman from New York did not offer it as an amendment but offered it as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. RUBEY: Strike out "$30,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$40,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the manual provides that there can be an amendment, and an amendment to the amendment, and a substitute. I offer an amendment to the amendment and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] offers a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The vote would first come on the amendment to the amendment, because the amendment to the amendment is a perfection of the original proposition, and then the vote would come on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stands corrected. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 76.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri demands tellers. All in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Nineteen gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like to be counted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is too late.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, there were 25 gentlemen standing here.

The CHAIRMAN. There were less than 25 gentlemen standing when the Chair counted. Gentlemen pop up and sit down and pop up and sit down. The Chair would state that the rule is that gentlemen should rise on the demand for tellers and remain standing until counted. The Chair does not count gentlemen that rise and immediately sit down.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Chair is entirely right in that ruling, but in view of the situation——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am addressing the Chair on a question of order. I will let the Chair attend to these gentlemen according to the regular order. The ruling of the Chair is entirely right in respect to the matter of the gentlemen just rising, but, in view of the situation, will not the Chair repeat that call for tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. If the demand is questioned——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not question it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will repeat the call. Those who are in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and be counted. [After counting.] Twenty-eight gentlemen, a sufficient number, have arisen, and tellers are ordered. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] will take their places as tellers. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 86.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have it reported.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks for a division.

Mr. ANDERSON. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. SNELL and Mr. RUBEY to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 21.

So the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. It is a quarter after 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory. There has been no debate and no business has been transacted.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we have had three amendments passed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that as to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, while it has been made heretofore, there have been several votes and amendments acted upon or proposed amendments acted upon since the motion was last made, and the Chair would hardly be inclined to hold that the motion at this stage is dilatory. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RUBEY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. DOWELL and Mr. RUBEY to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] that the committee do now rise.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 19, noes 92.

So the committee declined to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RUBEY. A division, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.
Mr. SNELL. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. The Chair will count all gentlemen standing. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended by the substitute.
The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 16.
Mr. RUBEY. I ask for tellers.
The CHAIRMAN. Tellers have just been refused.
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-nine Members are present. The Chair is also present. A quorum is present. [Applause.] The Clerk will read.
Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:
Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Page 69, line 5——
The CHAIRMAN. That paragraph has not yet been reached.
Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Then I will ask that my amendment be read when we reach that point.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk read as follows:
Total for Bureau of Crop Estimates, $322,856.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, pending that I move that the committee do now rise.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.
The motion was agreed to.
Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:
S. 2692. An act to amend section 24 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:
S. 3371. An act authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the White River; and
S. 2775. An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. GOLDFOGLE, indefinitely, on account of illness.
To Mr. MARTIN, for one day, on account of illness.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11960, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order. I think that we ought to have a quorum. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 13, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,
Mr. GREENE of Vermont, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12162) authorizing a per diem allowance for officers on recruiting duty, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 626), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,
Mr. BABKA, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10598) to provide for the payment to the First National Bank of Sharon, Pa., for certificate of indebtedness of the United States, No. 3240, for $10,000, which has been lost, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 627); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk and laid on the table, as follows:
Mr. FOCHT, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2814) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Alphonse Desmare, deceased, and others, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 621); which said bill and report were laid on the table.
He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3214) for the relief of the legal representatives of Lapene and Ferré, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 622); which said bill and report were laid on the table.
He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6722) for the relief of Julius Zanone, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 623); which said bill and report were laid on the table.
He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8921) for the relief of Lena R. McCauley, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 624); which said bill and report were laid on the table.
He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11594) for the relief of John M. Higgins, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 625); which said bill and report were laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6102) granting a pension to Charles M. Walker, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:
By Mr. HARRELD: A bill (H. R. 12480) to prevent the theft of motor vehicles by establishing a Federal motor-registration bureau in the Department of Justice, with the registrars in each State for the purpose of certifying to all transfers of motor vehicles or conveyances used for traffic or travel by air, land, or water, and to prevent the sale or transfer of such vehicles until a certificate of ownership has been procured from such Federal motor registrar and prescribing certain penalties; to the Committee on the Judiciary.
By Mr. SANDERS of New York: A bill (H. R. 12481) to provide for the erection of a monument to Robert Morris, at Batavia, Genesee County, N. Y.; to the Committee on the Library.
By Mr. OSBORNE (by request): A bill (H. R. 12482) to preserve historical documents, records, and relics, relating to the history of the United States, that are or may come into possession of the Government of the United States; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.
Also, a bill (H. R. 12483) to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a forest experiment station in cooperation with the University of California; to the Committee on Agriculture.
Also, a bill (H. R. 12484) legalizing conveyances made by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi: A bill (H. R. 12485) providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a post-office building thereon at Magee, Simpson County, Miss.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. STEELE: A bill (H. R. 12486) authorizing the several district courts of the United States to appoint official stenographers and prescribing their duties and compensation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEAGALL: A bill (H. R. 12487) to suspend all immigration to the United States until January 1, 1930; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. SABATH: A bill (H. R. 12488) to provide employment, homes, and additional bonuses for those who served with the military and naval forces of the United States during the war between the United States and Germany and her allies through the reclamation, acquisition, and development of lands and building of homes, to be known as the national soldier settlement home and bonus act; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GRIGSBY: A bill (H. R. 12489) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building"; to the Committee on the Territories.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 13, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, by a thousand tokens Thou hast shown that we are children of Thy care. Thou hast put at our command the mighty forces of this great Nation, greater forces than Thou hast ever committed into the hands of any organized society. We pray that in the use of the forces that Thou hast put at our command we may have a due regard for Thy glory and for the purpose of God in all government. Save us from the temptation of great riches and of great power. Keep us humbly following Thee, that we may accomplish Thy purpose in us as a Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. BRANDEGEE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIM (S. DOC. NO. 220).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Assistant Attorney General, submitting a judgment rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimant in an Indian depredation case in the sum of $1,115, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

EINAR BOYDLER (S. DOC. NO. 219).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a judgment rendered by the Court of Claims amounting to $262.36 in favor of Einar Boydler, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the fiscal year ended October 31, 1919, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

EPIDEMIC OF INFLUENZA IN ALASKA (S. DOC. NO. 221).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a supplementary estimate of appropriation in the sum of $80,072.85 to reimburse the Territory of Alaska for expenditures made in behalf of natives of Alaska during the epidemic of influenza, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES—DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE (S. DOC. NO. 218).

S. J. Res. 154. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to turn over to the State of Kansas emergency hospital equipment, to be used temporarily in emergency hospitals to be established in the State, and for other purposes.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that an article by Frank H. Simonds on the peace treaty with Germany may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, Jan. 25, 1920.]

PEACE HAS BEEN DECLARED IN A FAR FROM PEACEFUL EUROPE—MISTAKES HAVE BEEN MADE THAT APPEAR CERTAIN TO RESULT IN FUTURE CONFLICTS—GERMANY SEES A CHANCE TO TURN HER APPARENT DEFEAT INTO A REAL VICTORY.

[By Frank H. Simonds.]

"The actual putting into operation of the peace of Paris, to combine the several agreements of Versailles, St. Germain, and Neuilly under the name they will doubtless bear henceforth, and the date of the application of the terms of peace, January 10, 1920, mark one of the great historic moments of modern history. If one seek parallels they will be found only in the settlements of Westphalia, in 1648; of Utrecht, in 1712, and of Vienna, in 1815.

"In each case a new Europe emerged from a colossal struggle, and it is not less clear that a new Europe has emerged, however shadowy in form as yet, from the World War, which officially ends with the first month of 1920. Now, in the examination of this new Europe, it is essential first of all to compare the present situation with that of the Continent at the moment when the recent war broke out, that is, on August 1, 1914.

"At that date Europe was divided approximately evenly between two great groups of States, which were themselves nations with long traditions and well-defined policies. France, Russia, and Great Britain confronted Germany, Austria, and Italy. But the adherence of the British to the Franco-Russian group was more or less subject to a national, or at least a parliamentary referendum, before war could be declared, while the association of Italy with the Austro-German group was based on a positive alliance, but only for defense.

HOW IT CAME ABOUT.

"This grouping of powers had resulted from the rapid rise of Germany to continental domination in the years between 1870 and 1914—that is, between the Franco-Prussian War and the World War. The association of France, Britain, and Russia was due to the conflict between German purposes and the policies of the three nations. In annexing Alsace-Lorraine in 1871 Germany had made a permanent enemy of France; in joining Austria in barring Russian pathway through the Balkans to Constantinople Germany had driven Russia into the opposing camp, while the challenge to Britain on the sea had led the British to their historic course of intervention on the Continent, as the French under Louis XV and Napoleon had provoked similar intermixture.

"By contrast Austria, despite her defeats of 1866, had been drawn into the German orbit by fear of Russia and by the ever-growing menace of Pan-Slavism, acting upon her own Slavic millions. Italy had been maneuvered into a similar relation by the cleverness of Bismarck in making use of French occupation of Tunis in 1881, which closed to Italy a promised land of colonial expansion and Mediterranean power.

"In the early years of the Triple Alliance, when it was faced by the Franco-Russian Alliance, which was manifestly peaceful in character, the groupings of powers had contributed to the preservation of peace. But more and more the Germans perceived that while their own rise and development had been more rapid than the Russian, their future was still dubious, if Russia remained united and was able to draw to her vast camp the small Slav races of Austria and the Balkans.

A SERIES OF CLASHES.

"In the years from 1905 to 1914, a full decade, therefore, we had a series of incidents, clashes between alliances; in Morocco, over Bosnia and in the Balkans, which resulted most unfavorably to the Triple Alliance, brought Britain into line with France and Russia, weakened Italy's adherence to the Triple Alliance, and compromised the existence of Austria. By 1913, at the end of the second Balkan war, the Germans saw clearly that unless a successful war could change the situation in their favor, Austria would be destroyed, the states arising on the ruins would be hostile to Germany, and Germany would be barred by the British on the seas and by the Russians on land, and would in the next half century sink to the rank of a second-class State, as contrasted with Britain, Russia, and the United States. In that situation Germany risked the World War, believing that for the moment military superiority was hers and victory would enable her to erect her own system in Europe and destroy the Slavic menace by dividing the Slavs and provoking in Russia a revolution which would put Russia out of the world game for many years to come.

GERMANY'S MISCALCULATIONS.

"Germany's calculations, correct in the main, were upset by a misunderstanding of British policy at the outset and by the entrance of the United States in the final phase. Owing to these two circumstances, coupled with an underestimate of the fighting capacity of France, Germany lost the war, although she did achieve the ruin of Russia and came within an ace of winning the struggle before the United States arrived.

"But in the first weeks of 1918, when the Germans believed that they had won the war, the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, followed by the treaty of Bucharest, clearly indicated what the German policy was, and created in fact that Mitteleuropa, that coalition of States and races of Central Europe under German domination which was always in the German mind from the beginning. The design was to continue and increase the servitude of the Slav races of the east and south to the German and Hungarian minorities, occupy Poland, and administer the Baltic provinces.

"No such comprehensive or well-reasoned policy marked allied councils. The wholly vague formula of liberating enslaved races, with very little regard for historic, strategic, or economic considerations, served for the opponents of Germany during the long years when they were steadily forced to contemplate the possibility of losing the war outright, and the swiftness of the decision in the end surprised them without a statesmanlike solution.

POSITIVE RESULTS.

"The result has been that the Paris conference has proved wholly incapable of creating an order or a system on the ruins of a system undeniably wrecked by the war. So far as the British are concerned, they have effectively disposed of the German challenge on the water, both from the naval and the commercial sides. The German war fleet and the German merchant marine have disappeared; on the commercial and colonial sides the victory has been more complete than those won over Spain, Holland, or France in past centuries.

"As to the French, they have regained Alsace-Lorraine, temporarily, at least, escaped from the practical terrorization and paralysis of their national life by German menace, have better military frontiers, have a disarmed Germany before them, occupy the Rhine for the present, and the coal regions of the Saar may conceivably pass to them in perpetuity, while for 15 years at least any German attack will begin far within German territories and encounter the Rhine as a barrier. By contrast, both the French and the British have paid a terrible price for victory, the French vastly in excess of the British, and both will have a long struggle to regain national health.

ITALY'S GAINS.

"Italy, on her side, has regained her unredeemed territory, established herself at last on the crests of the Alps at the Brenner Pass, and achieved, with allied aid, the destruction of her former Austrian oppressor. She, like France and Britain, has acquired certain colonial lands, but wholly inferior even to those gained by France. She has, morever, quarreled with her French, British, and American allies or associates, with the Jugo-Slavs, and with the Greeks, while her effort to occupy a portion of Asia Minor has brought her into conflict with the Turks and her mandate for Albania promises future expensive military operations.

"The significant fact is that the natural alliance between Britain, France, and Italy, the logical successor of the old Triple Entente, which might guarantee the peace of Paris, has not yet arrived, may not arrive, as a consequence of Italian resentment at Franco-British policies, while the presence of the United States as a guarantor of such an alliance—that is, of the situation created by the peace of Paris—is now hardly to be expected.

"Turning now to the center of Europe, we see that the Allies have endeavored to make good their promises of liberating the subject nationalities, but in doing this they have been guided by narrow and academic formulæ rather than by economic, political, or strategic facts. They have accepted the destruction of Austria-Hungary, but they have not sought or achieved any stable equilibrium in its place. They have drawn boundary lines across the center of Europe, striving faithfully to follow ethnographic circumstances, but ignoring economic facts, thus condemning regions and peoples newly liberated from tyranny to misery, famine, extinction, if these boundaries are maintained.

"In neglecting the economic considerations they have been not less careless of the political. They have failed to prevent the clash between the Italian and the Jugo-Slav, the Serb and the Roumanian, the Pole and the Czech. Thus, instead of a new system of States mutually friendly and all associated with the western liberators in a virtual alliance to preserve the system created at Paris, instead of several States each possessing the necessary resources for a viable State, they have assisted at the erection of a crazy quilt of mutually hostile States on the foundations of the old Hapsburg Empire, several of them doomed to perish for economic reasons, several of them bitterly hostile to their liberators and ready to make terms with the old enemy.

POLAND AND ROUMANIA.

"Particularly in the matter of Poland and Roumania, each now become a State of considerable proportions, each with an area as great as Italy—Poland with a population of 30,000,000, Roumania with 17,000,000—the western nations have dealt with incredible stupidity, seeking to compel these two States to conform to academic ideas of ethnographic frontiers, usually incorrectly described. Thus, instead of having in the East and at the Russian boundaries two States capable of real development, the western allies have sacrificed Poland to Germany and alienated Roumania by seeking to deny Roumanian lands because of fear of ultimate Russian resentment.

"In the new Europe which we see at the present hour, then, the situation is this: France and Great Britain are unquestionably bound together by a community of interests and dangers which insure joint action for a long time. With them Belgium must be reckoned for obvious reasons. But Italian adherence to this Anglo-French bloc is far from certain. Looking eastward, Poland and Roumania, natural members of the western alliance, have been weakened, and, in the case of Roumania, alienated. In case of Bolshevist attack upon Poland the Allies have so wrought that Poland may be unable to resist the attack, while Roumania is bound to consult her own interests rather than act in conformity with western powers, which have consistently sacrificed her rights to Russian ambitions. As for the group of States on old Hungarian territory, Hungary and Austria are definitely hostile and necessarily driven to a future German alliance; Czechoslovakia is isolated and at odds with Poland; Jugoslavia is involved in fatally compromising disputes with Italy and with Roumania. Bulgaria, too, is forever hostile, while Greece has been sacrificed to this permanently hostile Bulgaria.

"Now, it is fairly plain that if Britain, France, Italy, Poland, Roumania, Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, and Greece could be united in a common policy of defense of European order and stability, the alliance thus constituted would be adequate to defeat any German or Russian assault, to prevent the development of a Russo-German alliance.

GERMAN'S CAPITAL CREDIT SUGGESTION.

"It is patent that if such a group of nations had the United States as a moral and economic, if not a military, partner, some real system might be evolved, even Austria and Hungary might ultimately be drawn into a Danubian federation, rather than into a German combination, thus abolishing the economic impossibility of the present situation. But unhappily just this firm association has been prevented, perhaps permanently, by the progress of events in Paris and the unhappy effort to make peace without regard to historical, economic, or political facts, and solely with regard for academic principles abroad and domestic political circumstances at home.

THE OTHER PICTURE.

"Turning now to the other side of the picture we see, as against an Anglo-French alliance, still struggling to expand itself into a European system, two enormous facts, the one German and the other Russian, and both necessarily and so far as the future can be read, permanently hostile to the western combination. Germany has been conquered, but neither permanently crushed nor yet conciliated. Conciliation was at all times impossible, unless the French and Belgians were to be made the victims of German outrages and condemned to perish in a vain effort to restore German depredations without German indemnities. Permanent weakening was possible only so far as the Allies were able to create a new Europe which would be sufficiently strong to make a renewal of German assault impossible.

"I would not be understood as arguing that more territory should have been taken from the Germans, save in certain details on the Polish side. Germany probably would have been able in the future to retake such territory, and the creation of new Alsace-Lorraine would mean only poisoning anew the system of Europe. What I do mean is that if Poland had been properly assured of her Baltic exit and of her eastern frontiers, if Roumania and Jugoslavia had been sufficiently strengthened, saved from an empty quarrel over the Banat, if some form of friendly federation had been built upon the ruins of Austria-Hungary, the German would have found himself unable, with hope of victory, to undertake anew the battle for continental domination, and might have followed peaceful policies and become with time a good European.

"As it is, the German now looks out upon the east, with a Poland whose sea gate is reached through a corridor German cannon can close, whose single port of Danzig is only in part his own, whose eastern frontiers are open to Bolshevist attack, whose Ukrainian and Czech neighbors are hostile. Looking southward he sees a Middle Europe turned into chaos, Austria beckoning him to come as a master, Hungary equally sure to invite deliverance, economic and political, and Bulgaria totally unreconciled and still capable of useful aid if the old struggle is resumed.

"Beyond Bulgaria he perceives a Turkish and Mahometan world eruption. Whatever he may think of the vitality of Pan-Turanian dreams, he sees that millions of Turks, Tartars, Kurds, Turcomans, Arabs, Egyptians, all the way from the Ægean and the Nile to the frontiers of Afghanistan, and even beyond them in India, are restless or even fighting against his old allies, menacing Egypt and India, threatening Syria, where the French are; menacing Mesopotamia, where the British rule.

AND THE BOLSHEVISTS.

"Finally he discovers the great Russian Bolshevist wave rolling outward in all directions, marching toward the Pacific, the frontiers of India, the highlands of Asia Minor, sweeping down to the Black Sea, and making some sort of common policy with the Mahometan millions for attack upon Egypt and upon India. And he can equally clearly see that for these Russian Bolshevists, quite as much as for himself, the extinction of Poland is a matter of immediate importance.

"Now, the German has to make a great decision for the future. Will he accept his defeat, will he pay the price of losing the last war, expressed in money and in power, or will he seek to avoid the payment of this price by associating himself with the Bolshevist and the Mahometan? Will he become a 'good European', accept defeat as did the French after Napoleon fell, associate himself with his conquerors, permanently acknowledging British naval supremacy and commercial domination, or will he seek by a new combination to reopen the old battle, to escape the consequences of defeat, and renew his struggle for world hegemony, following European supremacy?

"It does not seem to me the answer is difficult to discover. No nation in all history would accept the fall Germany has suffered in the last five years as an end to national ambitions unless all chance of victory for the future, if the contest were reopened, should be eliminated. And the German can look at contemporary Europe and see possibilities of future success on all sides. He may choose an active or a passive rôle for the present, immediate or ultimate association with Russia, but in the meantime Russia works for him by assailing Britain in Egypt and in India, and in menacing Poland, the extinction of which must be his own first concern.

A NEW ALLIANCE SURE.

"Almost infallibly the new alliance in Europe, which will challenge whatever survives of the association of powers which won the last war, will be a Russo-German group. Almost equally certain this group will enlist the Mahometan bloc, which extends from Cairo to Kaoul. Such an alliance will have an enormous population, incalculable resources in men, materials, and supplies, and will be beyond the reach of sea power. It could only be checked if all the rest of the civilized world stood firm against it. But would it?

"Looking at Europe to-day, the German perceives that Italy is hardly to be counted upon by his old enemies; he perceives that Roumania has been practically lost by Anglo-American policies. He may exaggerate the weakness which has overtaken France as a result of the war, but the weakness is unmistakable. He may place too great value upon the present reaction in America against further European action, but the reaction is an unmistakable fact.

"But what is important to note is this circumstance: If you and I were Germans, who believed in 1914 that our country was called upon to fulfill a great world mission, if we thought in the well-known German manner then, would we now, when we were faced with a future which promised national decadence, if we accepted it, a long period of foreign occupation and an enormous payment to foreign Governments, a permanent abdication as one of the great world nations, resign our old vision and settle down to what lies ahead?

THE CURE.

"The answer seems to me clear. To cure Germany of her vast and evil dream we had not merely to defeat her in war, which we just barely succeeded in doing, but we had also to create a stable European system, which would be a barrier to her further efforts to realize her fond illusions. Just this the peace of Paris does not do. If German pathway was inviting in 1914, it is ten times as inviting now, whether one looks south toward Constantinople or east toward Moscow. Instead of solid barriers, Germany looks only at jerry-built States and Governments, incapable of standing unaided and lacking those guaranties from western nations which alone could insure their development into lasting edifices. A war has been lost, but to the German the opportunity has not been removed; rather it has been enhanced, in so far as Russia has been transformed from a certain enemy into a possible ally and perhaps an ultimate vassal.

"We come almost inevitably, then, to the conclusion that the Allies who won the war lost the peace. The great opportunity to erect barriers against a new German flood had disappeared. Instead we have not merely the old German menace, but the new Russian peril. If we had crushed bolshevism when the moment was favorable a year ago, Germany would have to-day looked out upon a Europe offering her no possible ally and no favorable field of exploitation; the saved Russia would have been a partner in our new system, a great force in our new Europe.

"Instead we failed and permanently alienated 125,000,000 Russians, who are to-day moving more and more clearly toward a temporary association with 75,000,000 Germans, who remain equally outside our new system, who hate us and our ideas with a hatred which is no longer to be mistaken. And in this Russo-German sea of hostile millions the little Slav and Latin States we have fashioned in the East and South are chips. They could hardly be maintained even if we sent vast armies to them now, once Russia begins in earnest or whenever Germany resumes.

SLAV AND TEUTON.

"Is it conceivable that the Slav and the Teuton will fight? In such a fight there would be salvation for the rest of the world. But the nations of the Entente are an enemy whom both detest far more than they detest each other. No; the thing seems fairly clear: In the new Europe, which begins with the present month, an alliance between the Slav and the Teuton to overthrow the settlement of the peace of Paris is almost inevitable.

"This is not to say that German armies will spring up overnight or a new German war arrive this year or next. What it does aim to assert is that the present conditions in Europe hold out so much hope to the German of ultimate realization of his old ambitions that he will not now lay them aside; rather he will cherish them and await the hour when they can be realized. He is powerless now, but his conquerors have totally failed to close his pathway, their hour is passing, their system is already threatened by deadly attack from Russia, their alliance is crumbling, America is gone, Italy patently bitter and resentful, Britain faces wasting exertions in all her far-flung Empire from Ireland to India; France, victorious, is almost bled white. The little races, newly liberated, hate each other more than their old oppressors. In sum, the peace of Versailles, like the historic settlements of the past, only marks the end of one world-wide struggle to usher in the first act of another. In 1914 we, the western nations, had only one foe, and that was Germanism; to-day we have the old foe, but we have in addition another at least equally deadly, namely, bolshevism. Nor is it inconceivable that Germany herself, although losing the recent war, has opened a breach through which the new enemy may yet penetrate."

GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, on the 9th of this month, I think it was, there was some discussion on the floor of the Senate as to who was paying the cost of schools on grounds owned by the Government and in possession of the Navy Department and also as to the operation of places of amusement upon those grounds. The Secretary of the Navy seems to have taken notice of it and has sent letters to two on three Senators in which he explains the matter. I think his letter ought to be read by the Secretary into the RECORD, and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 11, 1920.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With reference to Senate bill 3738, which abolishes the United States Housing Corporation, I desire to invite your attention to certain apparent misapprehensions on the part of the Congress in relation to the Navy Department's interest in housing projects built for it at Bremerton, Wash., at Indianhead, Md., and at South Charleston, W. Va., as noted in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 9, 1920.

The projects, including the schoolhouses—should they be transferred to the Navy—will be run without expense to the Federal Government. The Navy Department will continue to operate them in the present manner. The school-teachers are paid out of funds appropriated by the State and are employed through the State officials. While there are certain moving-picture houses running in buildings thus provided at the two latter places, there is no expense whatever involved to the Federal Government thereby. These are absolutely self-sustaining in every way. The rental obtained from the houses, hotel, and dormitories in question pays for their repair and maintenance, together with the light and water furnished.

To turn these projects over to the Treasury Department involves the suggestion of leasing certain lands to that department. The lands are an integral part of the Navy's activities, such as smokeless-powder factory at Indianhead and ordnance plant at South Charleston. It appears that the most economical and advantageous way not only for the Government but for the employees is to have these projects under the direct charge of the inspectors of ordnance in command at these two stations. The schoolhouse not only takes care of people living on Government reservations but also takes care of people in the vicinity, and without these schoolhouses Indianhead and South Charleston will lapse into the situation that existed prior to the war, where it was practically impossible for an employee or officer to give his children a common-school education. The Government in these cases is doing no more than that done by any reputable private corporation.

In order that the Navy may maintain and utilize the buildings in question it must charge a sufficient rent for the same to cover the cost of maintenance and operation. This is the present practice. The Navy can not allow employees to occupy these buildings for nothing. It is thus seen that the Federal Government will not be required to pay out any sums for these buildings, but, on the contrary, there should be turned into the Treasury each year the residue from the rentals over and above that required for operating expenses.

In view of the foregoing it is to the best interests of the Government that the Navy Department operate the Housing Corporation activities at Bremerton, Wash., at Indianhead, Md., and at South Charleston, W. Va. It is desired that such a change be made in the bill in conference.

This letter will explain the situation between the Navy and the United States Housing Corporation more fully and thus clear up the points which arose on the floor of the Senate on the 9th instant. I have sent a similar letter to Senators FERNALD, SMOOT, and KING.

Very truly, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

Senator PORTER J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

REMOVAL OF SOLDIER DEAD FROM FRANCE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on Monday, at her request, I introduced a letter from Mrs. Griffiths relating to the problem of the transportation back to America of the dead bodies of those who lost their lives in the war. Some reflections in that letter, I am sorry to say, were made upon one Col. Kromer. I am in receipt of a short letter from a friend of that gentleman, an officer in the Army, who perhaps would not desire to have his name used. In view of Mrs. Griffiths's reflections upon Col. Kromer, I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without the signature?

Mr. THOMAS. Without the signature.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1735 NEW HAMPSHIRE AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., February 11.

Senator CHARLES S. THOMAS.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With reference to the letter from Mrs. Griffiths about Col. Kromer, which you had inserted in the RECORD of February 9, I am taking the liberty to request that you ask the War Department to investigate the case.

Col. Kromer is a warm personal friend of mine, having been my particular chum at West Point, and a more conscientious, hard-working, courteous man never lived. He returned from France in December and is now on duty at Fort Sam Houston, Tex. He was in this city during the month of January, and in telling me of his work in France with the graves registration service he told me the story of Mrs. Griffiths. It was quite different from that given by Mrs. Griffiths in her letter, and in publishing that letter without giving Col. Kromer a chance to reply I feel that you have done him a grave injustice.

We Army officers are quite helpless to defend ourselves from attacks in Congress, and perhaps I have no business to take up this matter with you. But, as a man, I feel I have the right to ask justice for my best friend, regardless of the fact that we are Army officers.

As to Col. Kromer's character, I should like to have you consult Mr. Sweet, Assistant Secretary Department of Commerce, who has known him since he was a boy and is mainly responsible for his being in the Army.

Very sincerely,

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next at the close of the morning business I shall address the Senate upon some of the economic features of the German treaty.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have received telegrams from citizens of Jacksonville, Fla., urging the adoption of universal training, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., February 11, 1920.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We favor universal training. Please advise our congressional Representatives.

William N. Dunham, Ernest L. Landrum, Frank Cartnel, George W. Clark, Edward S. Diver, John H. Hall, John C. Temple, A. B. Potter, Loren H. Green.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., February 11, 1920.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We ask congressional Representatives to vote for universal training.

John C. Burrowes, Bernard Thyson, Morgan Cress, James D. Stuart, Ellis Crenshaw, Edward S. Spencer, Henry Doig, J. N. Wilson, William E. Ross.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., February 11, 1920.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We urge vote for universal training by congressional Representatives.

C. J. Williams, Harry Hasson, D. M. Jones, Joshua Chase, Marcus Fagg, Clifford Payne, Waldo Cummer, Myron L. Howard, John P. Murphy, Paul Saunders.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Strongfellow Padgett & Co., of Jacksonville, Fla., and a memorial of the Grain Dealers' National Association, of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Gronna wheat guaranty bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the National League of Commission Merchants, of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the manner in which perishable vegetables are being handled by the American Railway Express Co., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Southern Cattlemen's Association, of Little Rock, Ark., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Kendrick-Kenyon bills to regulate the packing business, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petition of L. L. Hine, city clerk of Bradentown, Fla., praying for universal military training, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Rotary Club of Ocala, Fla., and a petition of Chase & Co., of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for the ratification of the peace treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Gronna wheat guaranty bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the United Women of Maryland, Second Division, of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide prompt and adequate means of protection for the Republic of Armenia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of Meade Post, No. 14, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Sterling; of Pap Thomas Post, No. 52, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Great Bend; of Jules Williams Post, No. 155, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Oskaloosa; and of McCook Post, No. 51, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Iola, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented memorials of the Mennonite Church of Meade, of sundry citizens of Butler County, in the State of Kansas, and of sundry citizens of Mayes County, Okla., remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of Hannah Camp, No. 23, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Traverse City, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Grand Ledge, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the National Farm Loan Association, of Northport, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Smoot land-bank bill, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 19, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Detroit, Mich., praying for a two-year extension of Government control of railroads, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Division No. 385, Order of Railway Conductors, of Ionia, Mich., and a memorial of Local Lodge No. 308, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, of Traverse City, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins-Esch railroad bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of the Civic and Commercial Association of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of a national highway system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a memorial of Local Division No. 385, Order of Railroad Conductors, of Ionia, Mich., and a memorial of the Pere Marquette Board of Adjustment, Brotherhood of Railway Employees, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the adoption of the antistrike clause in the so-called Cummins-Esch railroad bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

LANDS IN HAWAII.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3461) to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 424) thereon.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY EXCHANGE COMMISSION.

Mr. THOMAS. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I ask that that committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 19) authorizing the appointment of an international monetary exchange commission, which was referred to that committee on the day of its introduction, and that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is here objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3904) to amend the revenue act of 1918 with respect to yachts and pleasure boats; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. PHIPPS:

A bill (S. 3905) granting a pension to Anna M. Falls (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3906) granting a pension to Margaret I. Paulsen; and

A bill (S. 3907) granting an increase of pension to Charles E. Fuller; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3908) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HARRISON (for Mr. JONES of New Mexico):

A bill (S. 3909) to amend section 6 of the Federal aid road act; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. KING:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157) prescribing the method by which the war profits and excess profits taxes imposed by title 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1919, shall be computed for the calendar year 1919; to the Committee on Finance.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 11, 1920:

S. 3327. An act granting certain rights of way and exchanges of the same across the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in the State of Utah; and

S. 3452. An act authorizing the city of Detroit, Mich., a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the American channel of the Detroit River to Belle Isle.

ADDRESS BY JOHN BASSETT MOORE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have here a copy of a very able address delivered by Hon. John Bassett Moore, vice president of the executive council of the International High Commission at the second Pan American Financial Conference, in the city of Washington, which I desire to have printed as a public document. Perhaps the first step toward this end is its reference to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The address will be so referred.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Perth Amboy, N. J., inclosing the official vote or referendum taken on four propositions relating to the treaty by that organization.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PERTH AMBOY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Perth Amboy, N. J., February 10, 1920.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing a copy of a referendum taken by our chamber of commerce which indicates the feeling on the League of Nations. This referendum was taken under authorization of our board of directors and conducted under the usual restrictions as to secrecy and honesty of ballot.

We have a membership which is about one-half manufacturers, one-fourth merchants, and the other fourth civic members, representing professions and trades. This was conducted so that we might have tabulated the feeling of our community as represented by its business interests. Our board of directors took no other official action.

Sincerely, yours, CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
I. T. MADSEN, President.

Attest: F. E. HILTON, Secretary.

Official referendum taken by the Chamber of Commerce, Perth Amboy, N. J., Feb. 5, 1920, upon the League of Nations as per the four following propositions.

First proposition: I am in favor of the League of Nations as included in the peace treaty with Germany in its original form as submitted to the Senate by President Wilson	22
Second proposition: I am against the League of Nations in any form, and do not believe that it should be included in the peace treaty	22
Third proposition: I am in favor of the League of Nations with such reservations as will command the necessary two-thirds vote in the Senate to ratify same	73
Fourth proposition: I am for the League of Nations with reservations as submitted by Senator LODGE	66
Total votes cast	183
Votes in favor of League of Nations in some form	161
Votes against League of Nations in any form	22

Above is the result of a secret mail referendum vote taken by the chamber of commerce, Perth Amboy, N. J., February 5, 1920.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
F. E. HILTON, Secretary.

QUESTIONS OF ORDER.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on June 30, 1919, I submitted a resolution to amend the rules of the Senate and it was referred to the Committee on Rules. The resolution proposed that when a point of order was to be made in the Senate it must be made at the proper time, and that the proper time was before any discussion had ensued on the merits of the controversy before the Senate. The whole object of the resolution was to save the time of the Senate. I have noticed, and other Senators have also noticed, that the Senate might discuss a proposition for two or three days upon its merit, and at the expiration of that time some Senator would raise a point of order to the proposition, and it would go out on the point of order. My proposed amendment of the rule is designed to make the same rule apply in the Senate that applies in the House; that is, if a point of order lies against a proposition, it must be made at the proper time, in order to save discussion on the merits of the proposition.

Although the Committee on Rules reported this proposition out unanimously, some question has arisen in regard to it; and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution (S. Res. 104) may be recommitted to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

SALE OF SURPLUS GOVERNMENT STORES.

Mr. RANSDELL. I present a petition signed by several hundred grocers of the city of New Orleans, La., which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to make a very brief statement. The petition shows that the United States Government, through the operation of its Army subsistence stores, is working a great injustice to the grocers of the country, and "we, the undersigned retail grocers of New Orleans earnestly protest against the continuance of a policy which is detrimental to the interest and welfare of the legitimate distributor of foodstuffs, besides being unfair, undemocratic, and un-American.

"The grocers are loyal citizens, contributing to the support of their country and paying, as they do, Government income taxes, city, State, and municipal taxes. During the war they very patriotically sold all of the licensed commodities at cost, in order to help win the war. These licensed commodities figured about 75 per cent of their entire stock.

"We submit that this policy of our Government is ruinous, not only to the retailer, but is reflected on the jobber, manufacturer, and producer, and its continued operation will surely cause a great upheaval of business conditions in the near future."

I will state in passing that I understand the practice is soon to be abandoned by the War Department.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question. Did I understand him to say that the maintenance of these retail grocery stores has been abandoned by the War Department?

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not so state. I said that I understood they were soon to be abandoned. I suppose when they get rid of the surplus stores that they have on hand they will be closed. My information is rather indefinite, I will state to the Senator, but that is the best information I have.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I asked the question because I have had some letters from keepers of grocery stores and similar supply stores in my State complaining of the institution of these stores by the War Department. Does the Senator happen to know whether these retail grocery stores instituted by the War Department sell to everybody or confine their trade to people of the Army? Do they compete——

Mr. RANSDELL. My understanding is that they sell to anyone who wishes to buy the goods, but I really can not give the Senator any very satisfactory information. I have understood that they sell to anyone; that they are trying to get rid of the goods they have on hand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was somewhat surprised when I found that the War Department was engaging in that activity. I assumed that it was to be only temporary, while they were disposing of the surplus stores that had been bought by the Government for the conduct of the war.

I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if he has any information about this matter. I do it because, as I said, some of my constituents are interested in the question and have displayed considerable anxiety, and I wondered if the chairman of the committee has any information from the department as to its intention in the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President, I have no definite information. I have understood that the Government was selling these surplus stores and selling them at a certain percentage above cost. I assume that that price is lower, perhaps, than the ordinary retailer could sell the same goods for. It is a part of the effort to reduce the high cost of living, and it has been a failure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I supposed it was, but it is a convenience of the public, I have no doubt, to buy goods cheaper than the regular stores sell them for. The question of the wisdom of the policy may not be an unmixed one. I assume that the Government has an amount of stores on hand. It does not want to destroy them and can not keep them forever, and they should be disposed of; yet at the same time my constituents who write to me about the matter seem to feel aggrieved that they should be selected, having done their share in maintaining the expenses of the war and having subscribed to every patriotic fund that was raised for its conduct. They seem to think that it was a hardship upon them that they should now be thrown into competition, if you can call it that, because it is impossible for them to compete with the Government, which is selling at wholesale purchase prices in competition with citizens of the Government, who have to charge some profit over and above the wholesale price which they paid for the goods, and it is really a hardship upon them.

I know nothing about the intention of the department. I have no doubt the people could stand such a competition if it is for a limited time and for a limited amount, but, of course, if it is to be in any way worked into a permanent policy it would be ruinous, and it could undoubtedly be applied to every department of the Government.

Mr. RANSDELL. I merely wish to add that I know nothing in the world about the policy of the department. I assume that it is merely trying to dispose of the surplus now on hand as the result of the sudden closing of the war. I am sure the department does not intend to attempt to go into the business of retailing groceries in competition with the grocery merchants of the country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is my information that the department has been more criticized for failure to dispose of the surplus goods than for its action in so doing. The complaint can not be based upon very serious considerations because the quantity on hand can not possibly last long enough to seriously disturb the retail market anywhere. I think the officials of the Government would be very much subject to criticism if they kept on hand goods which had been paid for by the taxpayers and for which the Government no longer had any use. On the other hand, the Government would be criticized probably also if it turned these goods over at a low price to the wholesalers and permitted them to make a profit and then to the retailers and permitted them to make a profit.

It seems to me the plan that has been adopted by the War Department is on the whole a wise one, to dispose of the goods direct to the consumers at something above the cost price to the Government. The competition which is engendered is brief, and it is the lesser of the evils involved.

My criticism of the department has been that it has been too slow in disposing of its surplus goods. We need an immediate reduction of taxation. The department has surplus goods on hand which will materially mitigate the burdens of taxation by reducing the indebtedness. As I remember a recent statement by the Secretary of the Navy, we have reduced the indebtedness of the United States something like a thousand million dollars by selling surplus goods in this country and abroad. I believe that the policy adopted by the department is subject to commendation rather than criticism, and that whatever disturbance exists will be very short lived.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope the Senator did not understand me to be criticizing the department in the matter at all. I am not. I would not criticize any department or any official of the Government upon a matter about which I knew nothing. I was asking for information simply, and stated that I had letters from some constituents of a similar nature to the petition which the Senator from Louisiana read. I hope that the department will at best give us information as to how long these sales are to continue.

I have no doubt the Government has got to dispose of its surplus war material. In some cases, I suppose, it will be done at a sacrifice. I read an article in one of the Washington newspapers last evening stating that the entire fleet of ships which had been taken from Germany was to be sold, and the article complained that they were being sacrificed, and sold at from one-half to one-third of what they were worth, and being sold to one purchaser, without any competition and upon conditions which prevented other would-be purchasers from competing. As to the truth of that I do not know.

I was surprised to read that article, Mr. President, because I had thought it was the policy of the Government to have and maintain a large Government-owned merchant marine. If that is the policy of the Government, it would seem to me to be exceedingly unwise, just as we have secured the best merchant-marine fleet in one block, as the result of the war, immediately to dispose of it to a concern which, the article to which I refer stated, was flying a foreign flag and was not altogether beyond criticism in some of its operations. To me any foreign flag is yet a foreign flag, I will say to the Senator from Washington; and the International Mercantile Marine, if that be the name of the company, was stated by this article to be a British concern, upon the vessels of which the British Government had some call to use as a part of its auxiliary naval force.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I did not hear the first statement made by the Senator from Connecticut, but, as I understand, he refers to some statements in a newspaper with reference to a purported alleged sale of the German ships. I will say that I called up the Shipping Board this morning to inquire in reference to this matter. I had been told that it had been stated that they were going to sell the ships and close the deal on next Monday. I could not believe that there was any truth in that. However, I called them up, and they advised me that they simply expect to open bids and receive proposals on next Monday; that after those bids are submitted and opened they, of course, expect to consider them and take into account the entire situation with reference to the ships, and then to determine whether they will accept or reject any of the bids.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield, Mr. President?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KING. It has been charged in several newspapers—editorials have been written charging the same thing—that a secret arrangement, a secret contract, had been entered into between the Shipping Board and a certain corporation by which a certain number of German ships would be sold for $28,000,000. Is there any truth in that charge?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any truth in it or not; I do not believe there is. This administration is not of my party; the Shipping Board officials do not belong to my party; but I believe that they are honest men; I believe that they are patriotic American citizens; I believe that they are seeking to do what they think is the wise and businesslike thing to do; and until there is very convincing proof to the contrary I will not believe that they have entered into any such agreement as that which has been alluded to. I feel satisfied that they have not done so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the Senator from Washington made special inquiry with reference to the specific matter as to whether or not those officials have had any understanding, express or implied, with this particular corporation as to the sale of those ships?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the first suggestion that has come to me with reference to anything of that sort. I have not gone especially into it, Mr. President, because I consider that Congress is the legislative branch of the Government; I consider the Shipping Board as a part of the administrative branch of the Government; we have invested them with certain administrative authority, and I assume that they will discharge their responsibilities in the way that they think is wisest and to the best interests of the country.

I have heard that some of these things were being contemplated, and I have made some inquiries with reference to them and as to the situation generally. They have advised me as I have stated here. They have also stated that, from the surveys they have made, it looks like it will cost fifty or sixty million dollars to put the ships in proper condition, and they say it is a proposition which they feel must be given consideration as to whether it would be wise for the Government to appropriate fifty or sixty million dollars and expend it on those ships, and then keep the ships, or whether it would be wiser to sell the ships and allow private parties to make the repairs. I think it is a matter that ought to be given very careful consideration. I think it is a matter that we ourselves could not very well decide, but that probably must be left to an administrative officer.

I have been assured by them, although I have not asked them specifically—because, as I have said, the suggestion which the Senator made has not come to me before—I have been assured through the representatives of the board that they expect to look into the matter very carefully and to take into account all the various conditions concerning it and to determine what would be the wisest thing for the Government to do.

I will say, further, that Chairman Payne, of the Shipping Board, telephoned me a short time ago asking to appear before the Committee on Commerce at 2.30 o'clock to-day to explain the situation as it is now presented to the Shipping Board. That is all the information I have with reference to the matter.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I merely wish to ask the Senator if the Senate Committee on Commerce has not been having hearings for some time—very elaborate and comprehensive hearings—on the general question of what shall be done with our fleet of ships?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We have been having hearings with a view to determining the policy which shall be pursued in the future.

Mr. RANSDELL. And do not the committee expect to have the Shipping Board itself give its ideas as to what shall be done?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. We are trying to get all the light possible on the question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. And that would include, I take it, the disposition of the German ships as well as of others?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, certainly. I had hoped that the representatives of the Shipping Board would appear first and present their suggestions, but they have asked that they might come in last. They are apparently seeking information, as we are, with reference to the determination of a general policy for the future.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to say that I indorse every word he has said about the patriotism of the Shipping Board and its attempt to do exactly what is right and proper in the premises. It is ridiculous, in my judgment, to think that they would dispose of this great fleet of German ships at any such price as the newspapers have stated, or that they would do so without first making every effort to ascertain exactly what those ships are worth and what can be secured for them in the markets of the world. I am sure there is nothing in the statement which has been made in reference to the matter.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Washington yield for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. KING. Since the Senator from Washington has been upon the floor I have talked over the telephone with Judge Payne, of whom, of course, no eulogy is necessary, because of his ability and his integrity. He tells me apropos of this charge that there is not a scintilla of truth in it; that it is an absolute falsehood.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was satisfied of that.

Mr. BORAH. What is it that is an absolute falsehood?

Mr. KING. The charge that a secret agreement or any agreement has been entered into by which the German ships shall be sold for $28,000,000 to a certain organization.

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to know if it is an absolute falsehood that they are going to sell $154,000,000 worth of ships for $28,000,000? That is what they are trying to do, as I shall develop in a few moments when I can get the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am certainly glad to receive information along those lines from the other side of the Chamber. If it came from this side of the Chamber——

Mr. ASHURST. There are Senators on this side of the Chamber who state facts as they exist, without regard to whether the facts strike Republicans, Democrats, or Prohibitionists.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad of it.

Mr. BORAH. May their tribe increase.

Mr. ASHURST. It will.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course the mere making of an inquiry as to the facts should not be considered as a reflection upon the patriotism or integrity of these men; but, as I view this matter, it involves a great question of policy. It is not merely a question of disposing of these particular ships, but certainly that involves the question of what the policy of the Government is to be with reference to the building of a great merchant marine. I think if it should cost $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 to put these ships in such condition as would enable them to be operated, it might be well invested if it were done in consonance with a policy which was going to enable us to hold our part of the commerce of the world against our neighbors.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. The ships are proposed to be sold for $28,000,000. They approximate 350,000 tons. At the price stated it amounts to $80 per ton. England offered $125 a ton for this tonnage which it is now proposed to sell for $80 a ton. It would cost $60,000,000 to bring this incomparable fleet of 30 ships that we took from the Germans to a point of recondition where they could be operated. Add $60,000,000 to the $28,000,000 and you have $88,000,000. The fleet is worth $154,000,000 at prewar prices, and it is worth $300,000,000 at present prices; yet it is proposed to be sold for $28,000,000.

I am going to say more about this subject when I get the floor in my own right. I have a few facts here which the country ought to know about; indeed, I will ask unanimous consent at this juncture to introduce a joint resolution, and I ask permission to speak for five minutes on the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHURST. I will ask that the joint resolution be read, for I propose to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 155) directing the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to sell no vessels belonging to the United States except at public sale was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation proposes to sell on February 16, 1920, to the International Mercantile Marine Co. and its affiliated companies the following vessels taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the Great War, to wit: Grosser Kurfurst (Aeolus), 13,108 gross tonnage; Kaiser Wilhelm II (Agamemnon), 19,360 gross tonnage; Amerika (America), 22,621 gross tonnage; Kocln (Amphion), 7,409 gross tonnage; Neckar (Antigone), 9,835 gross tonnage; Bohemia (Artemis), 8,413 gross tonnage; Rhactia (Black Arrow), 6,599 gross tonnage; Prinz Eitel Friedrich (De Kalb), 7,797 gross tonnage; Wittekind (Freedom), 5,640 gross tonnage; Peruv (Eten), 8,500 gross tonnage; George Washington (George Washington), 25,569 gross tonnage; Freiderich der Grosse (Huron), 10,771 gross tonnage, Vaterland (Leviathan), 54,281 gross tonnage; Konig Wilhelm II (Madawaska), 9,409 gross tonnage; Martha Washington (Martha Washington), 8,312 gross tonnage; Barbarossa (Mercury), 10,983 gross tonnage; Prinz Joachim (Moccasin), 4,760 gross tonnage; Kronprinzessin Cecilie (Mount Vernon), 25,070 gross tonnage; Pennsylvania (Nansemond), 13,332 gross tonnage; Prinz Eitel Friedrich (Otsego), 4,650 gross tonnage; Prinz Oskar (Orion), 6,026 gross tonnage; Hamburg (Powhatan), 10,531 gross tonnage; Princess Irene (Pocahontas), 10,892 gross tonnage; Bulgaria (Philippines), 11,440 gross tonnage; President Grant (President Grant), 18,172 gross tonnage; Princess Alice (Princess Matioka), 10,891 gross tonnage; Rhein (Susquehanna), 10,058 gross tonnage; Mark (Swanne), 6,493 gross tonnage; Kronprinz Wilhelm (Von Steuben), 15,000 gross tonnage; Wyandotte, 2,450 gross tonnage; and

Whereas the said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation apparently proposes that said vessels and all thereof shall be sold to the said International Mercantile Marine Co. and its affiliated companies for the gross sum of $28,000,000, notwithstanding the prewar valuation of said vessels was fixed at the sum of $160,000,000: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That neither the fleet of vessels nor any individual vessel taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the Great War shall be sold except to the highest bidder for cash in hand, after proposals to sell such vessels shall have been widely published for at least three months next preceding the date of sale and at a figure commensurate with their value.

During the reading of the joint resolution,

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Secretary to say that I will not ask that the names of the ships be read. The list embraces the large and expensive liners seized from Germany. One of them is the Leviathan, of 54,200 tons capacity, which carried 160,000 soldiers across the sea during the war. Another is the George Washington, which carried the President to Europe and return. I will ask that the names of the ships be included in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if the list included in his joint resolution is the same list that was printed in the Washington Times last night?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know; I presume it is.

After the reading of the joint resolution,

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, these ships, 30 in number, aggregate about 350,000 tons. At a price of $28,000,000 they would bring $80 a ton. I repeat that Great Britain offered $125 a ton for them, and yet they are to be sold at $80 a ton. The prewar price of these vessels was $154,000,000. I drew the resolution hurriedly, and instead of the prewar price being $160,000,000 it is $154,000,000.

What are these ships which it is proposed shall be sold on next Monday?

The Vaterland was rechristened the Leviathan after being seized by the United States. She is the biggest ship afloat, boasting 54,281 tons. When seized she was valued at $10,000,000. The Shipping Board now proposes to sell her to the International Mercantile Marine at $80 a ton, at which price she will bring about $4,300,000.

The Kronprinzessin Cecilie has about half the tonnage of the Vaterland, but is reckoned a very big ship. Her tonnage is 25,070, and at the sale price proposed by the Shipping Board she will bring only $2,005,000. She is easily worth more than twice that sum. After her seizure she was renamed the Mount Vernon.

The Kaiser Wilhelm II, Americanized as the Agamemnon, has a tonnage of 19,360 and a passenger-carrying capacity of 2,417. She is purely a passenger ship, having no cargo space. She is a gorgeously equipped vessel, providing every modern comfort and convenience.

The Princess Irene, renamed the Pocahontas after her capture by the United States, is small in tonnage by comparison with the Vaterland, being only 10,892 tons, but larger than the Vaterland in passenger-carrying capacity. She has accommodations for 2,384, as against 2,264 on the Vaterland. At the rate per ton asked by the Shipping Board she will bring only $875,000.

The President Grant, which naturally retained her patriotic name after her capture from the Germans, has a tonnage of 18,172, which, at $80 per ton, would put her sale price at about $1,450,000. She has the greatest passenger-carrying capacity of the fleet, accommodating 3,303. She, also, is beautifully equipped.

The Kronprinz Wilhelm was renamed the Von Steuben. Her capacity is 15,000 tons, but she carries 1,511 passengers, and is, therefore, no infant among ships. Removing the United States flag from her peak and replacing it with the British flag will net this country $1,200,000, which is little better than giving her away "at a mere fraction of her value."

The George Washington, like the President Grant, retained her name after her seizure. She was used by President Wilson and his party on their several trips to Europe during the negotiations which resulted in the League of Nations. She is 25,569 tons burden and carries 2,755 passengers. If sold at the rate per ton acceptable to the Shipping Board, she will bring a little over $2,000,000.

It is proposed now that these ships shall be sold, forsooth, because it will cost $60,000,000 to put them into a condition of efficiency where they can be used.

I ask leave at this point to have read a letter I received this morning from Judge John Barton Payne, chairman of the Shipping Board, on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The letter was read, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
February 12, 1920.

MY DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: Answering your inquiry re sale of the ex-German passenger ships, the reasons were principally these:

1. It is the opinion of the Shipping Board that we will probably not be able to successfully operate passenger ships with prohibition in effect in competition with foreign ships which sell liquor.

The reason why is: In December we fitted out the Moccasin to sail to South America. Her berths were all sold. When I announced that, in view of the policy of the Congress of the country, Government ships would not be permitted to sell liquor, one-half of the sailings were immediately canceled.

2. We advertised the ex-German ships, and for 20 were offered $20,000,000. We had a careful calculation made as to the cost of reconditioning these ships for passenger service, and this reached the sum of $57,000,000. In view of the present situation it did not seem to us that we were justified in incurring so large an expense.

3. Conditions in the shipping world are such that it is our conviction that there will never be a time when we can sell ships to better advantage than now, and since it is our conviction that the ships can be successfully operated in private ownership, we believe the sale should be made.

4. Two conditions are insisted upon by the board:

(a) That the ships shall remain under the American flag.

(b) That they are to be sailed in the routes indicated by the Shipping Board. This, we believe, will adequately protect the United States.

Very truly, yours, JOHN BARTON PAYNE, Chairman.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I need not say that neither my remarks nor the joint resolution I have introduced constitute a reflection on the Shipping Board. It might just as well be said when I take an appeal from a nisi prius court to another tribunal that I am trying to insult the nisi prius court. If it be a reflection on the Shipping Board to ask that the ships be not sold, it might as well be said when you petition for a rehearing in the Supreme Court of the United States that you are making some reflection on that great court.

I am making no reflection on anybody. I am not even reflecting on "John Barleycorn." But, Mr. President, we talk of small leaks and we talk of inefficiency here and speak of heavy expenditures; but here is a great fleet which American genius and American courage and the fortunes of war put into our hands—350,000 tons—about to be sold at a grossly inadequate value. The great statesman, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], stood for months trying to get a few ships for the United States. He was trying to build up a merchant marine. His speeches were published throughout the United States, showing the necessity for a second line of the Navy, to wit, carriers of all kinds. His speeches convinced me. The statesmanship of his remarks and the remarks of other Senators, showing the need of a fleet to carry the commerce of our country, seemed to be convincing to all. Now, since the fortunes of war and American money and American genius have put this fleet of 350,000 tons into our hands, we are proposing to dispose of it for $28,000,000, forsooth, because we can not get a higher bid!

Mr. President, I will guarantee to the Shipping Board that if they will announce that on the 1st day of March an ocean liner will dip her prow into the water and will start for San Francisco, passing the placid blue of the Carribean, passing through the Panama Canal, and over the Pacific for 2,500 miles as she goes northward, every berth will be occupied whether there is to be any liquor on board or not. I will guarantee that American citizens in New York and throughout the whole eastern country will flock to the steamship offices by the thousand to go through the canal on that American ship to the California coast. Why, they can carry 50,000 passengers a month if they will only establish a line of ships between San Francisco and New York. But hold! such steamers plying between the East and West might reduce freight rates and passenger rates; therefore we must have no line of ships plying between San Francisco and New York, because the eight transcontinental railroad lines are going to see to it, if they can, that there is no competition by water between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. I wonder if that be the reason why we are to have no steamers carrying passengers and freight between our two shores?

We know, Mr. President, what the transcontinental railway companies did on the question of Panama Canal tolls. They were so influential that they induced Congress—a Democratic Congress—to violate its own pledges and go back on its promises, and require American ships to pay toll as they went through an American canal.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield in just a moment. I have some figures in my mind that I want to state, and I will not yield at this time.

So, Mr. President, I want here, as a Senator and as an American citizen, to protest against any action which will dispose of this fleet. It is necessary as a second line of defense for our Navy. This fleet is necessary to serve as a part of our merchant marine. We obtained it by the fortunes of war. If we have trouble again, there will be another request for several hundred millions more to build more ships to replace these that we sell next Monday. Against that kind of statesmanship I protest. Against that kind of inefficiency I protest. I care not who may be responsible, whether he be Democrat or Republican, or whether he be high or low in official circles, it makes no difference to me.

That is all I have to say. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I yield the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for a question, then.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator from Arizona advise the Senate what, if any, notice was given by the Shipping Board of this proposed sale—in other words, what, if any, opportunity has been given for competitive bidding?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Georgia can answer that question, I shall be glad to have him do so. I can not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been advised that there has been no sale proposed, but that the purpose is, at the time stated, to accept competitive bids.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, not to accept, but to receive competitive bids.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To receive them, I mean.

Mr. KING. To open them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To accept them in the sense of receiving them. I did not mean to close the trade, but that no trade has been made at all, and that on the day named the board intends to open the subject and take bids then, open to the world.

Mr. POMERENE. If that be true, how does the Senator account for Mr. Payne's letter, in which he says that he believes this figure of $28,000,000 is the highest sum they can get? I am glad to get information. I hope the Senator is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. I have called up the Shipping Board and asked them myself, and was told that the purpose was publicly to take bids at the time named. When is it?

Mr. ASHURST. On Monday, the 16th of this month.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, surely if they are asking for bids, and expect to receive them, they must have in contemplation the acceptance of these bids. They certainly are not asking for bids purely out of a sense of amusement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, not at all. I did not mean that. I was simply seeking to indicate that the public had not been closed out of bidding. They claim at the Shipping Board, I know, that it is their purpose, and that they have so advertised, that at some day named the public will have the right to bid, ship by ship; but I have not the information so definitely. I am satisfied that there is such a purpose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will allow me to make another observation, I have some information which leads me to believe that the public in the past has not had the opportunity to bid for some of these vessels that it should have had. I think we are all more or less interested in that subject.

I should like to ask another question, if I may. Has the Commerce Committee, or any other committee of the Senate, investigated and made any report to the Senate as to whether at this particular time we should or should not dispose of these vessels?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the Committee on Commerce has been holding hearings every day for a couple of weeks with a view to getting information upon which to base a recommendation to Congress as to a permanent policy.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it proposed to sell these ships before this committee shall have an opportunity to come to a conclusion and make a recommendation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, Mr. President, I understand that bids have been received. The Senator heard the letter read.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me read again two paragraphs of this letter, to wit, paragraphs 2 and 3. I will omit the paragraph regarding prohibition:

(2) We advertised the ex-German ships, and for 20 were offered $20,000,000. We had a careful calculation made as to the cost of reconditioning these ships for passenger service, and this reached the sum of $57,000,000. In view of the present situation, it did not seem to us that we would be justified in incurring so large an expense.

(3) Conditions in the shipping world are such that it is our conviction that there will never be a time when we can sell ships to better advantage than now; and since it is our conviction that the ships can be successfully operated in private ownership, we believe the sale should be made.

Mr. ASHURST. Judge Payne has not said in this letter when the sale will be made. I assume, from what I have read in the dispatches, that it will be made on Monday. In fact, I talked with Mr. Payne over the telephone yesterday, but because I do not accurately remember what he said about the time of sale I will not attempt to quote it.

Mr. POMERENE. The letter seems to be based upon the theory that it is conceded that the Government ought to sell these ships. I should like to have some information on that subject. I confess that I am just a little bit jealous of these ships. I do not want them to get out of our clutches if it is at all possible to keep them. The question of operation, whether it shall be private or public operation, is another question.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interject right there that, of course, my examination is brief and hasty, and what I know about shipping could be written on a caramel wrapper, but I do know a few obvious plain things. The fleet could not be duplicated to-day for $300,000,000. Now, the Senator may be assured that I am reasonably accurate in that statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator means the one that is to be sold?

Mr. ASHURST. The one that is to be sold could not be duplicated to-day for $300,000,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the last sentence in the letter of Judge Payne, which has just been read, is:

> We believe the sale should be made.

That states the conclusion to which the Shipping Board have come; and evidently, unless their opinion changes, they are going to sell those vessels at such price as is satisfactory to them.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] a few minutes ago, in discussing this subject, stated that in his opinion the question of the sale of these vessels was one for an administrative officer. I can not speak with authority about the provisions of the legislation which created the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. It may be that that legislation authorizes the sale by the board.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does; it authorizes the sale either by the board or the President. As the Senator knows, most of the vessels that have been built were built under our emergency appropriation that was really given to the President, and the President was authorized to sell, requisition, and all that sort of thing; so that there is authority, under the law, for the sale of the ships. That is the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. I have assumed that it must be, because the chairman of the board states that the board has decided to sell them, and I have such a high opinion of Judge Payne as to convince me that he would not do anything that the law did not authorize him to do.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest desire to criticize the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and if I had I have not the knowledge of the facts to do it. I do not know that there is any basis for any criticism. All I know is that here is the assertion in the Washington Times of last evening, set out with considerable display and covering, I think, two pages of that paper, that it is the plan of the board to sell these ships, which certainly are a magnificent block of ships. It was stated in that paper that it was the largest and best single fleet of ships of its kind in the world and it was stated that it is the intention of the board to sell those ships. Now, in spite of the fact that under war emergency conditions we may have passed legislation which authorized the board to build, buy, and sell ships, a transaction of this magnitude, representing the acquisition of a great block of ships not in the ordinary course of business of the Shipping Board, which the legislation was passed to regulate, but as a result of the allied victory, presents to my mind at least a question that may fairly be considered a governmental question, and a governmental question of such a character as might well and not improperly be the subject of an expression of opinion by Congress, if it desires to express its views.

The board may be entirely right and events may show that it is the part of wisdom, in view of the state of the market and the condition of these vessels, to sell them if they can get a proper price, and it may be that their opinion is correct that passenger vessels, owing to our prohibition policy, can not be successfully maintained by this country in competition with the passenger vessels of other nations, although at least some of these vessels are not entirely passenger vessels, for I noticed the cargo capacity of many of them, as set forth in the Times last night, and it was tremendous. Having no information whatever in the premises, my only interest is that time should be secured, so that the Senate, through its Committee on Commerce, may investigate this matter in an orderly and thorough way and endeavor to ascertain the truth as to the intention of the board.

Of course, from the letter of Judge Payne it does not follow that the board intends to sell the vessels unless it can get a proper price for them. He does not state about that. The resolution offered by the Senator from Arizona, however, states in its preamble that whereas it is the intention of the board to sell these ships for $28,000,000 to the International Mercantile Marine Co., the board is instructed not to make a sale of any of them. That sets forth a distinct affirmative declaration of facts about which I have no knowledge, and I would like to ask the Senator whether he is sure of that preliminary statement in the preamble of the joint resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. I may be in error as to the fact that they propose to sell the ships to the International Mercantile Marine Co., but you will notice that the resolution says, "And its affiliated companies." I will concede I may be in error in that. I may be in error as to the price for which they are going to sell the ships. I concede that, and I would not consider it a reflection if I were in error as to the price, but I think the main features and substance of the joint resolution are correct in the main, that the Shipping Board is about to sell the ships for a ridiculously inadequate price and at an early date. I might have stated that in the resolution; I wish now that I had. I think we can all agree on the common ground that the ships are going to be sold at a ridiculously low price at an early date to the International Mercantile Marine Co. and its affiliated or associated companies.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The resolution as framed appears to be a final direction to the board. I am not certain that the Senate has the right to direct the board——

Mr. ASHURST. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Unless Congress is prepared to modify or repeal the existing legislation. I am still not clear that we would have a right to direct a violation of the existing law, unless we intended to repeal the law. However that may be, I simply wish to express the hope that the Senate will adopt some resolution that will stay the hand of the Shipping Board until Congress can decide whether it is a question that it wants to take a hand in and determine as a governmental policy, and whether it desires to prescribe the conditions of the sale, if a sale should be agreed upon.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has correctly stated all that I hope to accomplish. I have no doubt 25 or 50 Senators, perhaps all other Senators, could have drawn a better resolution, and I will accept any amendment that will be efficacious to the end in view.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish the attention of the Senator from Arizona, because I desire to submit an amendment. The Senator's resolution provides, among other things:

> That neither the fleets of vessels nor any individual vessel taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the Great War shall be sold.

I want to strike out from there on and insert the following language instead:

> Until specific authority is granted therefor by Congress.

Mr. ASHURST. I accept that amendment. I have that right?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the Senator has that right.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I accept the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. As the Senator's resolution reads from there on, it says, "except to the highest bidder," and so forth. It does seem to me in a question of this magnitude, involving all these various valuable ships, no action ought to be taken until specific authority is given by Congress to take it. I realize that under the existing law the President through this board has authority, unless Congress enacts a different law, to make the sale. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing anybody for taking that position. To my mind it would seem to be a wrong step to take. It might be that upon investigation Congress would want to take that step, but I doubt it very much. Notwithstanding we have that law, if Congress should pass the joint resolution which the Senator from Arizona has introduced, as it is now modified by the amendment which I have suggested, it would in effect be an amendment of the law so far as these particular ships are concerned, and they could not be sold until authority was granted for their sale.

Mr. ASHURST. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I drew my resolution with a view to getting some action, and the resolution simply directs the Shipping Board to stay the sale. I feel certain that if Congress would pass a resolution asking that the sale be suspended for three months the Shipping Board would respect it.

Mr. NORRIS. As a matter of law, they would have to suspend the sale. They would not have any authority if the joint resolution is passed by the Senate and the House and is signed by the President; it becomes a law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator believe that the joint resolution ought to be amended so as to include the ships that were built as well as those that we captured from Germany?

Mr. ASHURST. That would be agreeable to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean to put a limitation upon the tonnage—5,000 tons or something like that. I do not think the board ought to sell our great merchant marine without the approval of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe it is a matter of sufficient importance for Congress to pass upon. It is one of the most important questions before the country to-day as to whether or not we are going to keep and maintain the merchant marine that we built up during the Great War. I do not think that the board ought to have the right to sell the great ships that we have built at great expense without the specific approval of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that sentiment entirely, although I presume Congress would have sufficient time to enact a law as to the other ships later. The emergency exists now, as I understand the Senator from Arizona, in regard to some specific ships that are named in the resolution. It is not contemplated to sell the other ships at the present time. So far as I am concerned I am willing to vote for an amendment that would apply to all ships the Government owns, but I would not want to endanger this resolution by putting in some other provision that would bring about a debate which would delay it, and probably these particular ships would be sold in the meantime.

Mr. ASHURST. If the resolution is to pass, it must pass before to-morrow night, and the more we put in it the more ground there is for objection. It is simply the ships we seized from Germany that we are trying to stop the sale of at an inadequate price. I do not consider that the question of Government ownership is at all involved. I have not touched that question. I have some definite views on that subject, but I have not touched it because we have not the time to debate it now.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I see in the newspapers that the Secretary of War made some protest against selling these German ships and expressed the hope that they might be retained, to which Judge Payne replied, calling attention to the fact that they were building ships for the purpose of transportation at Hog Island. The ships which the Shipping Board are building, as I understand it, and I think my information is correct, cost about $200 to $225 a ton. You can not run a ship profitably at that rate per ton. Every ship we build will be sold or leased at a loss, and yet we are going on building ships with the certainty of a dead loss on every one we build, at a time when we are talking about economy and retrenchment. I think the whole subject needs thorough inquiry and pretty drastic action. But this, as the Senator from Nebraska says, is an emergency case. We are selling these ships, I understand, at $80 a ton and replacing them with ships that cost $225 a ton.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is about correct in his figures.

Mr. NORRIS. Personally it seems to me that when we come to consider it we ought to consider whether it would not be advisable to enlarge the powers and activities of the Panama Railroad Co. that now owns some ships and leases some others. That is a corporation the stock of which is owned entirely by the Government of the United States.

It would be a very simple matter to lease these ships to a company like that, if we decide that is the right course to take, and they could be operated at whatever revenue they might bring.

I realize, or at least I believe, not being an expert, that we can not expect permanently to build ships at the present cost and operate them during the years that are to come and make a profit on them at that cost. It seems to me it would be foolish for the Government now to turn these ships over to some private company at a ridiculously low figure when, as other Senators have said, we might stand very much in need of them in the future, and would have to buy them back or build others at exorbitant prices. For the present, particularly since the committee is investigating it, we ought to ask the Shipping Board and those in charge to stay their hand, particularly as to these ships, until they can get specific authority for making the sale if it is decided later that they should make it. Personally I do not believe I would be in favor—I would have to be convinced if I did favor it—of selling the ships to anybody. But that question is not involved now; and whether we believe the Government ought to retain them, or whether we believe the Government ought to sell them, or whether we believe the Government ought to lease them either to the Panama Railroad Co. or some private corporation, or to some new governmental corporation, and have them operated by the Government—whether we have convictions on any of these various methods that might be resorted to, it seems to me that now we ought all to be united on the proposition that we can not afford to have them sold, as it is said they are about to be sold.

Mr. POMERENE. In any event, it does not appeal to the Senator from Nebraska as a good business proposition to sell these ships at $80 a ton when it costs at least $225 a ton to build new ships to take their places?

Mr. NORRIS. No, indeed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, about this matter perhaps we had better start with an understanding of what the law is. The ships that are now under the control of the Shipping Board and being operated by the Shipping Board were built in pursuance of certain appropriation acts in connection with the shipping act. Those appropriation acts authorized the President to build ships, acquire ships, purchase ships, operate ships, and to dispose of ships. All those words, as I recall, are expressed in the act. The act goes on further to provide that the President may name certain agents to carry out and execute the law.

The President proceeded in pursuance of that authority to name the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to build ships and proceeded to name as the agent for the operation of the ships the United States Shipping Board. Matters have been going on under that arrangement. The power to dispose of the ships is vested in the President in pursuance of those acts. It has seemed to me that was a mighty safe place to vest it. The authority, therefore, must come from the President to dispose of those ships or any ships. I do not know what order has been issued by the President, but certain it is, I take it, that the Shipping Board has passed certain resolutions outlining its policy, setting forth its views in connection with the handling of the ships, and has called on the President to make the order directing it to carry out that program. The President, I presume, has made that order and authorized the Shipping Board to dispose of the ships by sale under such regulations or conditions as the Shipping Board may see fit to impose. I presume that is the present status of the whole matter.

The real question is, What should be the policy of the Government with reference to these ships? Ought we to dispose of them or ought we to keep them? That involves also the general policy whether the Government ought to quit building ships entirely; that it should just go on and complete those already under contract and complete its present program and go out of the business entirely of constructing ships and repairing ships, and that sort of thing; and whether the Government should also go out of the business of owning, chartering, or operating ships and sell and dispose of all the ships which they have acquired by seizure, commandeering, purchase, construction, or otherwise. Those questions are involved in certain bills which have been introduced. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has introduced several. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has introduced a bill. There is a bill before the committee coming from the House, and there are certain resolutions pending before the committee. The committee has been giving hearings, as the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], has stated, with a view to making a report recommending what shall be the policy of the Government with reference to the building of ships, the owning, chartering, leasing, or the operation of ships, and the disposition of ships. That report we expect to produce within a reasonable time.

I will say that I introduced a resolution on June 30, 1919, Senate resolution No. 92, to this effect:

Resolved, That in the judgment of the Senate it is not advisable for the United States Shipping Board to sell at this time any of the merchant ships of the Government to foreign interests unless it be such as can not be successfully employed here.

There was a rumor then that sales were being made to anybody who might offer to buy any of the ships. The resolution went on:

Resolved further, That efficient merchant ships of the Government should not be sold at all at this time, except such ships as are undesirable for overseas trade and will bring approaching their actual cost or more, and then only with a view of replacing them with better ships and in order to properly balance the fleet.

That resolution was introduced by me in the Senate June 30, 1919, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, and it is before that committee now. I urged action and made some remarks about it at the time, and later, on October 17, which later appear in the RECORD at page 7062, there appears also a communication from the chairman of the Shipping Board and a list of the ships they had already sold, including steel vessels to the number of 26; wood and composite vessels, 20, of a dead-weight tonnage of 84,879; tugs, 5; and barges, 1. The total dead-weight tonnage of all those ships was 217,207, and $10,546,783.26 appears to have been the purchase price for those ships already sold, and some of the ships were of a tonnage of 7,462, 8,453, 9,778, 7,455, and so forth, but most of them were small vessels.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was not the Senator able to get any action on his resolution?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; no action has been taken, because, in the first place, my understanding has been that the Shipping Board had not decided upon the policy of disposing of the ships; that they were rather waiting for action by Congress to determine what course they should pursue. In fact, they said to us that they were open-minded about it; that they had not concluded that they ought to dispose of those ships or to cease operating the ships. They said they would leave that question to Congress to settle, and I thought matters were rather in statu quo with reference to that policy until the hearings were concluded. We have been expecting to call the Shipping Board before us, but they have asked that others should be heard first and then they will come and give their views. I have never understood that there was a definite policy determined upon by the Shipping Board.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator understands that if they sell these vessels that is the beginning of some policy?

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me so, and it seems to me that the only theory upon which this sort of sale can be based at all is the theory that the Shipping Board favors the Government going entirely out of the business, both the building and the operating and owning of ships. I do not agree with that policy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator's resolution, however, only applies to sales to foreigners?

Mr. FLETCHER. The first part of it did, but the second part referred to all ships.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator, in view of his statement that the Shipping Board have never informed the Committee on Commerce of any plan of theirs or recommendation as to our policy in respect to the shipping question, does he not think it is wise for us to stay the sale of these ships, if possible, until a policy can be formulated after due consideration?

Mr. FLETCHER. I was just proceeding to say that. Last October, at the time I made those observations with reference to that resolution, I said:

> I am not in favor of disposing of any of these ships at this time, except such as are not efficient and might reasonably be disposed of in order to balance the fleet. If it was left with me, I would not sell a rowboat, especially not to any other country.

That is my position to-day.

Mr. ASHURST. I heard the Senator's able speech, and I was impressed with it at the time. I heard the Clerk read his resolution in the Senate, and I gave it a great deal of reflection. A large part of the action I have taken this morning was predicated directly upon the courageous, the timely, and the statesmanlike action of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] last June.

The seed he has sown has germinated, at least, and he is on the right track. I hope and know he will continue to lend his powerful and able support to the suggestion that we shall not dispose of these ships, at least until we determine what the governmental policy may be.

I will say further, if the Senator will allow me, that I am not this morning talking Government ownership; that is a wide field that might be discussed later; but we ought not to foreclose it by permitting the ships to be sold. I may or may not favor it; but we are not talking Government ownership; we are talking about having an opportunity to discuss the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I agree with the Senator that we have not yet reached the point where we are seriously to consider the definite, fixed policy of the Government with regard to Government ownership and operation of ships. We must first establish a decent—I might say an adequate—American merchant marine. A merchant marine is not established by having a number of ships built. Those ships have got to be in use. The object should be to open the routes of trade; to put the ships through those routes and through the lanes of the sea in such a way as will meet the needs of American commerce. To do that requires a little time. We can not simply get the ships together and say we have a merchant marine. We must put them in the routes of trade and have the lines and schedules established and operated in such a way as will serve the producers, the industries, and the trade of the United States. When that is done we shall have our merchant marine established. We can then determine whether or not the Government shall dispose of its ships upon certain terms and conditions. I agree fully that the terms and conditions set forth in Judge Payne's letter should be included in every instance—first, that the ships must fly the American flag; and, second, that they must be used on the routes designated by the Shipping Board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How soon does the Senator think that the Committee on Commerce can submit to the Senate its definite views of a policy?

Mr. FLETCHER. It would be, of course, a little difficult to answer that, but I think the committee have very nearly completed the hearings. The chairman of the committee can probably tell better than I can about that, but I should not think the hearings ought to last more than a week or so longer. Probably in two weeks we may be able to conclude the hearings.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope that the committee will get through with the hearings next week, anyway; but I desire to say that so far as determining the policy which shall be pursued is concerned, it involves a tremendous problem. I do not think the committee probably will be able to report in a week.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should not think so. I stated we might probably finish the hearings in a couple of weeks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator from Florida one other question, and I shall also be glad to have the opinion of the Senator from Washington. In the meantime, is it the Senator's opinion that action should be taken which will prevent the sale of these ships until after the Committee on Commerce shall have reached a conclusion and Congress shall have acted?

Mr. SIMMONS. To what sale does the Senator from Georgia refer?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I refer to the proposed sale of these ships next week.

Mr. FLETCHER. With regard to that, my view is that it would be a serious mistake to sell those ships. I think we ought to hold them, unless there may be some of them that are in bad condition and which are not serviceable or efficient ships, for which we might get a good price and which, for certain reasons, purchasers might desire to acquire.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But as to the whole number of ships, the Senator is opposed to the sale?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am utterly opposed to that; I think it would be a serious mistake. I do not think five years will be too long for us to figure on as a time when we shall determine the policy of the Government as to whether or not it will permanently operate and own the ships.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has been studying this question for years and is familiar with present conditions in regard to shipbuilding up to date. In the Senator's judgment, what does it cost the Shipping Board per ton to build a new ship?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, to build passenger ships costs much more than to build cargo ships.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. It costs now from $200 to $215 a ton, perhaps a little less than that in some instances, to build cargo ships.

Mr. POMERENE. To what kind of ships does the Senator from Florida refer?

Mr. FLETCHER. To dead-weight tons and cargo ships.

Mr. POMERENE. What does it cost to build passenger ships?

Mr. FLETCHER. That would depend on the furnishings, finishings, and accommodations which are put into them. Those may be as elaborate as is desired, and it may cost as much as $400 a ton to build a passenger ship equipped in the luxurious way in which passenger ships were equipped before the war at least.

Mr. POMERENE. It would cost at least $400 a ton to duplicate the passenger ships which it is now proposed to sell for $80 per ton?

Mr. ASHURST. They are not all passenger ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. They are not all passenger ships, and they are not all new ships. In fact, most of them are from 10 to 15 years old, it may be.

The point raised by the chairman of the Shipping Board in his letter that it would cost some fifty-seven million dollars to recondition these ships as a reason why the board felt they had better dispose of them, it seems to me, is not well taken. In the first place, it ought not to cost anything approaching that amount to recondition these ships, and I believe the reconditioning of them could be done in the Government yards at a very much less figure than that. The people who put those figures before the Shipping Board were, in my judgment, making a profiteering proposal. It should not cost half that amount to put the ships in condition.

Mr. POMERENE. In any event the wisdom or unwisdom of reconditioning the ships should depend upon the policy which the Government will adopt in the future.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to ask the Senator if these figures of $57,000,000 for reconditioning the ships are correct, does not that amount to about $160 per ton in addition to the $80 per ton for which it is proposed to sell them?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not figured it out.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have figured it out, and it is a little over $160 per ton, which they say it would cost to recondition them. If that be true, and they should succeed in selling the ships before reconditioning them at $80 per ton, it would, in substance, be selling them for $240 per ton instead of $80, as many Senators have suggested. I am not urging the point at all, but I say if the Shipping Board is right in that respect, then it is going to cost a great deal to put these ships in shape.

Mr. FLETCHER. I see the Senator's point, and, of course, it is well taken. These ships are not in first-class condition; there has got to be some money spent on all of them, in some cases involving pretty expensive repairs. However, I am making the point, in the first place, that it ought not to cost any such sum as $57,000,000 to do that, and I do not believe it would cost that amount if the matter were properly managed. In the next place, I think even then, if the ships are put in condition, the price asked, according to the figures given, is exceedingly low. They are worth more money than that.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I simply desire to say that it seems to me in this discussion the fundamental questions involved are entirely overlooked. The question is whether we are to adopt a nautical Plumb plan for our shipping; the question is whether the Government is to continue to operate the ships or to turn them over into the hands of private enterprise, of American citizens, to sail under the American flag.

Now, what are the conditions? We have upward of 10,000,000 tons of shipping built or under construction, and we will have that amount of tonnage in a short time. What shall we do with all of that shipping? Shall the Government adopt a Plumb nautical plan and continue to operate those ships or shall we turn them over to private American citizens and let them operate them, as we hope to do in the future in the case of our railroads?

What are these German ships? A large share of them were passenger ships. They were remodeled during the war and made into troop ships. To make them useful again for passenger ships they must be again remodeled. Nearly all of the ships constructed by the Emergency Fleet Corporation were freight vessels and not passenger vessels.

The question now is, Shall passenger routes be established between this country and England and between ports of South America and the United States and shall our Government engage in that business? The Cunard Line and other British lines are now preparing and getting ready to build a number of passenger vessels to regain their command of the trans-Atlantic trade, as they commanded it before the war. With the exception, perhaps, of the Old American Line, we have, so far as I know, no passenger liners; we have no trans-Atlantic passenger lines at present; and the question is, Shall we enter into that field of competition and operate American passenger lines between America and the Old World and between our country and South America?

On top of that there arises the question, Shall the Government undertake this business or shall we put it into the hands of private American citizens and allow them to conduct the business? That is the question involved in this case.

I am saying nothing about the price of the vessels; I am not defending anybody; I am accusing nobody; I am simply calling attention to the fundamental question involved here, which is, Shall the Federal Government undertake to operate passenger lines across the Atlantic and to South America or shall we leave such business to private American enterprise? It is analogous, Mr. President, in many respects to the problem that has confronted the railroad committees of Congress; it is a question of whether or not we shall adopt a nautical Plumb plan.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as I stated at the outset, the main question is, What is going to be the policy of the Government? My position is that we have not reached the point where we are in a condition to determine that policy. We do need passenger ships in connection with the cargo ships; for instance, in the trade with the South American ports of Rio Janeiro and Buenos Aires. The people of South America go to Europe because they can cross by four or five different lines in 15 days. They can sail from Rio Janeiro to Genoa or from Rio Janeiro to English ports in about 15 days on the best kind of passenger ships, and the result is they go to Europe and they trade with Europe. I do not know of a passenger line affording proper accommodations between the United States and South American ports, and the time required for the voyage is about four weeks.

We need passenger lines as well as cargo lines. The one supplements and cooperates with the other. We need to balance our fleet; we can not have an adequate merchant marine based entirely on cargo ships, but, in my judgment, we need some passenger vessels. The Shipping Board has been discussing for some time past whether or not they would build passenger ships. In fact, they are now building 26 ships for passenger business. The ships they have heretofore built are cargo vessels; and right now, when they have some passenger ships, they can put them on these routes without interfering at all with private lines. There is no need of interfering with private lines in the trans-Atlantic trade, but we do need passenger ships in connection with our cargo ships if we are going to do business with our friends, especially in South America.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to say a word to the esteemed and learned Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who has made a very pertinent suggestion. I assure him that when I drafted the joint resolution which I have presented and when I argued for it I did not have in mind, and I do not now have in mind, any such plan as a nautical Plumb plan. Indeed, Mr. President, the Senator will remember that I distinctly stated that the question of Government ownership could not be involved here and ought not to be involved here. I assume that Senators, if any of them vote for the joint resolution, will not be committed directly or indirectly to any Government-ownership plan.

I repeat that the joint resolution does not commit anyone to a nautical Plumb plan or a Government-ownership plan; it simply stays the sale until we can determine what kind of a plan we do want. I want the Senator from Minnesota to feel assured that I am not trying by any covert means or any indirect means to commit this Congress to any nautical Plumb plan.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator, although I do not know who has the floor——

Mr. ASHURST. I have not.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have the floor, and I have yielded to Senators. I should like to finish as soon as I can, but I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Arizona, as supplemental to what I have heretofore said, that nearly all of the vessels the Emergency Fleet Corporation constructed during the war were freighters. The only passenger vessels we have that we could immediately put into use would be the German liners which we took during the war. They were converted into transports; they ought now to be converted into passenger vessels, and I think it urgent that they should be put into passenger lines in order that we may have American passenger lines between our country and Europe and between our country and South America. To my mind the only question is whether those passenger lines shall be operated and controlled by the Government or by private American enterprise and private American citizens.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield for just a moment for a suggestion?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Arizona and to the Senate that the joint resolution be amended by striking out in the first clause the words "on February 16, 1920, to the International Mercantile Marine Co. and its affiliated companies," and then strike out the second "whereas" entirely. Then there will remain a resolution which will merely prohibit the sale of the ships until the Senate and the House of Representatives can look into the matter. All of the other questions will be irrelevant; we will have stopped the sale, and that is all that is necessary to be done now until Congress looks into the matter further. I hope the Senator from Arizona will agree to that suggestion and let the amendment be made.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will yield——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Understanding I have a right to do so, I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand this is a joint resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then it should go to a committee, of course.

Mr. ASHURST. I was going to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of a joint resolution on its introduction? Such a resolution is the same as a bill and it should be referred to a committee. I should not consent to the passage of the joint resolution by unanimous consent, although I may not be opposed to it when it is looked into; but it is a joint resolution, similar in nature to a bill, and it is really contrary to the practice of the Senate to pass a bill upon its mere presentation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment of the joint resolution, and, if it is agreed to, I am perfectly willing that it may take that shape now, and then I will proceed with a few more words with regard to the policy.

I am perfectly willing to concede that now is a splendid time to sell ships. I agree with Judge Payne fully upon that point, that if we are going to dispose of these ships speedily and with a view to getting them into private hands as soon as possible and having the Government hasten its relinquishment of all activities in connection with shipping and the establishment of a mercantile marine, perhaps it is best to do so now, because the prices are good; but why not let the Government, while the prices are so good, hold on to a very good property? The people's money went into these ships—not these particular German ships, but into the merchant marine that we have. The proceeds of Liberty bonds are invested in these ships. The people of this country own them. Now, the rates are high. We can get back some of the extra cost that we put into these ships if we will operate them aright, and the board are operating them, I think, successfully. They have made a lot of mistakes. There is no doubt about that. They have had some difficulties; but still the ships are valuable and are earning money and, of course, the price is good now; but the fact that the price happens to be good is no reason why the Government should sell the ships. In my judgment the price is going to be good for years to come.

The British lost 12,000,000 tons of shipping during the war. They have built only about 2,500,000 tons per annum. That is about all they can build. Japan can not build over 400,000 tons a year. France can not build more than 500,000 tons a year. It is going to take time to restore the world's tonnage to the point at which it was in 1914, and during this time the freight rates are going to be high, and there is going to be demand for ships, and there is going to be profit in shipping. There is no question about that. Why should the Government just at this time, with these opportunities before it and in the presence of these necessities of the country as far as our foreign commerce is concerned, relinquish absolutely and entirely its control of shipping?

Mr. President, I just want to call attention for a moment to the importance of an adequate merchant marine. Of course, it is not necessary to argue that. You may say that we are not disposing of our merchant marine when we sell the ships to American owners to be operated under our flag, and all that sort of thing. You may find, the first thing you know, that foreign shipping interests will be behind many of these transactions, and you may find after a while that only half a dozen lines will have control of our shipping, and that, as I say, foreign interests are really behind those lines. There is a danger there.

Here is a document that I had printed, No. 335, entitled "The Problem of British Shipping," by Sidney Brooks, one of the distinguished authorities of England, and I desire to call your attention to what he has said on this subject:

> It is a commonplace to remark that without the mercantile marine we could not have waged the war, much less won it. Everyone can now see that tonnage has been the basis of the whole allied effort. But we were almost criminally late in recognizing this simple, quintessential fact, and in shaping our policy accordingly. The war had been going on certainly for two years—in my own opinion, for two and a half years—before the nation and its rulers had begun to realize that we are not a continental but an insular power, drawing our life from the sea. So little was this foreseen or suspected at the beginning of the war that we took men from the shipyards by thousands and tens of thousands into the army and the munition factories, and practically shut down on the building of merchant vessels. Then gradually and protestingly we awoke to the reality of the U-boat depredations. We found that just at a time when our factories were demanding more and more material from abroad and our armies were requiring unprecedented quantities of imported foodstuffs, and our allies were asking for the loan of ships and yet more ships, and half of our total tonnage had to be diverted from commercial to military uses, the German submarines were making inroads on our depleted shipping with a success that, if it could be maintained, would eventually end in paralyzing our fighting arm. There were weeks, there were months, in 1917, when the enemy's campaign seemed so likely to triumph that one could almost name the date when Great Britain's part in the war would be over. Sir L. Cholzza Money stated in the House of Commons on the 14th of November that had our losses in the month of April, 1917, been maintained we should have been "in deadly danger" in six months and "ruined" in nine months. I wonder how many people realize that in the first nine months of last year we lost almost a sixth of the entire mercantile marine with which we began the war, and that our output of vessels for the whole year was about 240,000 tons less than our losses during a single quarter. Our strength at sea was being steadily sapped, even though the fleet remained intact and supreme.
> Such a paradoxical conjuncture of affairs would have seemed unimaginable before the war. But then before the war we really did not know the meaning of sea power. We thought it meant dreadnoughts, cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and so on. We did not realize that it also meant liners, trawlers, tankers, tramps, and the ordinary merchant vessel. We did not grasp that while the fleets represented the striking and protecting half of sea power the carrying and supplying half consisted of the merchant marine, and that both were equally vital to the success of our military effort.

That is the statement made by this Englishman upon this subject, which it seems to me furnishes all that need be said to show that we will be derelict in our duty, we will be recreant to our trust, if we do not see, now that the United States has at last taken its place upon the seas and has realized at last the sea power that should be ours, that never again shall we be in the position, as we were in 1914, of being dependent upon foreign ships to carry our commerce, and never again shall we be in a helpless condition in case of trouble, as this article shows we will be unless we have merchant ships as well as an aggregation of floating batteries on the seas.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the resolution introduced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] was read; but I understand, from a colloquy between him and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], that the general purpose of this joint resolution is to stay the hand of the Shipping Board in the matter of the sale of these ships until the Government can settle upon some policy with reference to them.

I am heartily in favor of the joint resolution. I have listened with great interest to the presentation of this matter by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and I agree with the Senator in toto in the general statement that if we are ever to have an American merchant marine, now is the time for its establishment, and its establishment through the Government, because if the Government does not give us an American merchant marine we are not likely to have one.

Mr. President, of course, in the last analysis, Congress must decide what policy shall be pursued with reference to the ships that we now have. We must determine whether we want to retain them in Government ownership or to transfer them to private ownership. We are in danger right now of having that question settled for us by the Shipping Board instead of by the Congress of the United States. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] had referred to the analogy between this matter and the railroad matter. There is some analogy at some points. There is at other points no analogy; but with reference to the policy of the Government with regard to railroads, we did not permit the Director General of Railroads to decide that policy for us. The Congress itself, after due consideration, will decide that question. Unless something is done right now by the Congress, before the Congress acts the Shipping Board will have decided this question for us, and our action in the matter will be of but little importance.

For some time the Shipping Board has been selling off ships, and now it is proposed by the Shipping Board to sell the 30 big ships that we acquired from the Germans, the only passenger vessels that are now a part of our fleet. The Senator from Minnesota makes a very good point when he says that we need to balance this fleet, and have some passenger-carrying ships as well as some cargo-carrying ships. Now, if these ships are permitted to be sold before we have decided upon this policy, they will have sold off every passenger ship of which the Government is now in control.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator there. I will name just one ship that is proposed to be sold. There are others.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Leviathan?

Mr. ASHURST. The Leviathan is the largest ship, 54,000 tons. She, however, is not now equipped as a passenger ship; but listen to this:

The Kaiser Wilhelm II, Americanized now as the Agamemnon, has a tonnage of 19,360 tons and a passenger capacity of 2,400 persons. She is purely a passenger ship, having no cargo space, and she is one of the most, if not the most, gorgeously equipped vessels afloat, providing every modern comfort and convenience. That is only one of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] says that we must have passenger ships, and I think he is right about it. I think we will all agree that he is right about it. Yet we are sitting here inactive in the face of a proposition of the Shipping Board to dispose of every passenger ship that the Government now controls. The Senator says he wants the Congress to decide that question. How can the Congress decide the question as to the sale of these passenger ships if it remains silent until the passenger ships go into other hands?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again? Take the President Grant, which, of course, retained her patriotic name after we took her from the Germans. She has a tonnage of 18,172 tons. She has the greatest passenger-carrying capacity of the whole fleet. She accommodates 3,300 persons, is a superbly and beautifully equipped ship, and she is in the melting pot. She is to be sold with the rest. Two of them I have named. I will name some more.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment, Mr. President. If the Government shall ever part with these ships when we have decided that it is good public policy to turn them over to private ownership, the Government, I take it, would never do that without making adequate provision that they shall remain under the American flag. The Government would never do that without making adequate provision for the reconversion of those ships as auxiliary cruisers whenever the Government might have need for them for that purpose; and yet if this process of gradual disintegration of the little merchant marine that we have built up here during the war is permitted to go on, these ships will leave the Government without any binding condition with reference to whether they are hereafter to fly the American flag, and without any condition that the Government may at any time command them and see that they are at all times kept in condition to be easily converted to the uses of the Navy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I wanted to ask the Senator from Arizona a question while he was on his feet.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me to reply?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator from Arizona, in his statement this morning, to state that England had offered $125 a ton for these ships?

Mr. ASHURST. I was reliably informed—of course, I do not want to be set down as having stated an untruth—I was reliably informed by representative men who assume to have knowledge that England had offered or would offer $125 per ton for these ships. Now, I may be wrong, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I have no doubt that they would be glad to give $125 a ton for the ships; but it did seem to me strange that America was thinking of selling ships to England, even at $125 per ton, and England was thinking of buying those ships when she can not even pay the interest upon her debts to the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. It is an English company.

Mr. ASHURST. But if she had these ships she would not only be able to pay the interest but she could soon pay the principal from the profits that these great ships would bring her. I will leave it to the Senator from Florida, who is a very great expert on the subject. She would easily be able to pay the interest from the earnings of this fleet.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it would be very good business sense for the United States at this time to sell 350,000 tons of shipping to England at $125 a ton, and expect payment for those ships, when England now can not, or at least does not, pay the interest upon the bonds that she already owes the United States Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I inquire if the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has objected to the immediate consideration of this resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I said that I should insist on its going to the committee. It is a joint resolution, not a simple resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then that constitutes an objection to the immediate consideration of the measure, does it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think I can be taken off the floor in this way. I have the floor. I have not yielded to the Senator for the purpose of summarily disposing of this matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not tried to take the Senator off the floor. I made a parliamentary inquiry, so that we would understand what the situation was. I merely wanted to say that there is but five minutes left of the morning hour; and as the Senate can not act on this matter to-day, or at least until it is referred to the committee, on account of the objection of the Senator from Washington, I hoped that the regular order might be resumed; but of course I do not want to take the Senator off his feet.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have but a few more observations to make.

I am thoroughly convinced that if we are to have, within our day and generation, an adequate merchant marine, we will have, through the instrumentality of the Government, to establish that merchant marine right now. The Government has a large number of ships compared with what it had before the war, but we have nothing like an adequate merchant marine. We have not sufficient cargo ships to entitle us to claim a position as one of the great merchant-marine powers of the world. We have not enough cargo ships of that kind, and we have no passenger ships to speak of, such as are required in a well-balanced merchant marine. When we have finished building the 10,000,000 tons that the Senator has spoken of, we will have still an inadequate merchant marine. Now, my theory is that the Government of the United States is in a capital position just at this time to complete this merchant marine. It is in a magnificent position to complete this great merchant marine, to build and commission enough cargo ships and enough passenger ships to make a well-balanced, well-rounded merchant marine, worthy of the greatest Nation upon the earth. We can do that now more economically than it can be done by private individuals, because at great cost during the war we established the great plants in which these ships are being built. We own those plants. The International Mercantile Marine, which is the concern that wants to buy these 30 German ships, is a corporation that now, I understand, operates a part of its ships under foreign flags. They are the gentlemen who want to buy these ships. Do they desire to buy any of these costly plants that the Government created during the war for the construction of ships? No. Other gentlemen have gone to the Shipping Board and have made propositions to purchase ships. Has a single one of them offered to buy any of the plants that the Government erected during the war at a cost of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars? Not one of them. Does anyone in this Chamber believe that if the Shipping Board is permitted to carry out the present policy of doling these ships out to this corporation and that corporation it will buy plants and go on building ships until it has built an adequate merchant marine to meet the requirements of this great Nation? Is there any evidence in any of these propositions, or any evidence in any of the positions now being taken by the people who want to buy the ships, that it is their purpose to complete the American merchant marine; that it is their purpose to build the great passenger ships that we need; that it is their purpose to build additional cargo ships? Have they even offered to buy any of the facilities which the Government now possesses for the construction of these ships?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the joint resolution goes to the Committee on Commerce, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 1699. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the purpose I have in making this argument is that if these ships are sold in the way they are now being sold by the board to private individuals, then the great plants which the Government has built are going to be junked, shipbuilding in this country is going to come to an end, many of the ships that have already been built will go under a foreign flag, and at the end we will find that with all the expenditure of money and all this talk about the establishment of an American merchant marine our merchant marine will have disappeared and we shall have none.

Under those conditions it does seem to me that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has made a wise suggestion. Let us go on, Mr. President, in the construction of these ships. We have the plants, we have the equipment, we are able to build them cheaply. It is certain that we will build them if we determine upon that course, and in a short time we will have an adequate merchant marine. If we decide now to turn these ships over, we will find in a short time that we will have no merchant marine. We will be right back where we were before. The gentlemen who buy the ships will be coming here and saying we can not operate them under the American flag in competition with foreign Governments unless you give us a subsidy and put us in a condition to operate them under the American flag.

Let us go on and build up a great American merchant marine and balance it, and then when we have done that we will take this question up, just like we took up the railroad question, and we will decide whether we will operate the merchant marine by the Government or whether we will permit it under certain conditions framed, intended, and calculated to keep the merchant marine in the hands of Americans and under the American flag and subject to such subsidiary uses as the Government of the United States from time to time may require. In that way we will get a merchant marine; but, Mr. President, there is no other way. Preliminarily we may have an opportunity to decide it in case we determine that we will build no more ships; permanently in case we determine that we will build enough to complete our merchant marine. But, Mr. President, it is certain that with the policy now being pursued by the Shipping Board, cautiously pursued, first one little sale here and then another little sale yonder, and then, getting a little bolder, a bigger sale, as now proposed, if we remain silent here it will not be long before the thing will be decided for us without any voice in the matter at all.

I think, therefore, ordinary precaution requires that the resolution offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] should be passed, and that the Shipping Board should be given to understand that they are not to dispose of any more of these ships until they have secured the consent of the Congress.

I yield to no man in my desire to establish a merchant marine in this country. I have stood upon the floor of this Chamber and advocated it for the last seven or eight years. I think it is a consummation greatly to be desired. I did not years ago believe that such an opportunity as now exists for the establishment of an adequate merchant marine would come in my day; but it has come, and it seems to me that we are about to throw overboard and disregard the opportunity which is now presented to us. It would be a crime, Mr. President, to permit these ships to go into private hands unless we are assured by contracts that are binding that shipbuilding in this country is not to stop now, that shipbuilding in this country is to go on until we have an adequate merchant marine, and when we have an adequate merchant marine under the American flag it is not by hocus-pocus to be dissipated and become in a few years a marine controlled and directed under another flag.

I trust that the joint resolution will be passed.

RETURN OF RESIDENT POLES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, which I am instructed to introduce by the Committee on Military Affairs, and following its presentation to report it to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The joint resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas there are now in concentration camps at or near Warsaw, Poland, and have been since November, 1919, upward of 12,000 residents of the United States of Polish origin, who were equipped and transported at the expense of Great Britain and France from the United States to Poland, and who were engaged in active service in behalf of the allied cause during the war; and

Whereas they are desirous of returning to their homes in this country and are without means to accomplish such repatriation: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and hereby is, given to the Secretary of War to use such Army transports as may be available to bring back to the United States from Danzig, Poland, such residents of the United States of Polish origin as were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to discuss it briefly, and I am glad the Senator has asked unanimous consent for its present consideration. Of course, the joint resolution which I introduced has gone to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The resolution of the Senator from New York has not been agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. It is the pending business, but my remarks on that resolution will be an unreturning parabole. I do not expect to touch it or go near it, for I am talking about another subject.

The chairman of the committee, my distinguished friend, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], objected to the present consideration of the joint resolution I introduced. That is his right. I have no criticism; he would be justified in being offended if I intended a criticism, but I want him to know what is the result of his action. Judge Payne has telephoned within the last 20 minutes to a Senator that he is going to sell the ships on Monday, February 16, as the preamble to my resolution stated. That means that should the Committee on Commerce be convened to-day and report the resolution favorably, one objection to-morrow will kill the resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated that these ships would be sold on Monday.

Mr. ASHURST. A Senator just told me that he talked with Mr. Payne 20 minutes ago, and Mr. Payne stated they would be sold on Monday.

Mr. POMERENE. What reason is urged for this urgency sale under the circumstances?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know.

Mr. POMERENE. We will all be interested in knowing.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope Senators will pardon me for taking the time I did, but I felt that I ought to say a word. The result of the objection is to put it in the power of one Senator to-morrow to stop action on the joint resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why does not the Senator propose his resolution in the form of a Senate resolution requesting that the sale be not made until the consent of Congress is given?

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. I believe that is a wise suggestion, and I ask unanimous consent to do it when the Senator from New York has disposed of his resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether he thinks there is anything in the pending joint resolution that would infringe any immigration law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President. These soldiers were residents of the United States. I may say to the Senator that during the war, after our participation in it commenced, representatives of the embryo Polish government came to this country, and with the permission of the Government of the United States recruited something like 12,000 men for the so-called Polish Legion. These were men of Polish origin residing in the United States. A large number of them were citizens of the United States, and quite another portion of them had taken out their first papers. The British and French Governments transported them to France; the French Government uniformed and equipped them and organized them into the Polish Legion attached to the French Army. The Polish Legion, largely made up of American citizens of Polish origin, fought with the French Army during the last year of the war, and at the time of the armistice were sent to Poland, and since then have been in the Polish Army under Gen. Haller.

Recently those men have been discharged from the Polish Army and are living in a great concentration camp outside the city of Warsaw, unable to return to the United States. The War Department is operating a transport service between the United States and Antwerp for the service of our troops on the Rhine, and the Secretary of War informs me that it will be quite easy for the transports to proceed to Danzig, load these men, and bring them back to the United States, where they went from a few years ago.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, under the explanation made by the Senator, that the joint resolution ought to be very promptly passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I inquire of the Senator from New York about how many of them there are now and about what will be the cost of the transportation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Secretary of War informed me this morning that the appropriations are ample to cover this expense. The only thing that will materially increase the cost of operating the transports is the subsistence of these men while they are being brought home. I understand that Polish-American societies will be ready to see that they reach their homes all over the United States as soon as they arrive at either New York or Boston.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the Senator to state that a large number of these men are already American citizens?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A large number of them are American citizens.

Mr. McKELLAR. The joint resolution ought to be passed by all means.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I want to say a few words about the joint resolution which was introduced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and I deem it proper to say them now.

This is one of the most important questions that is going to come before Congress at this or any other session. The question of transportation is one of supreme importance. We have had much difficulty about the solution of the railroad transportation question and we are seeming to have much difficulty about the question of sea transportation. The time is quite ripe now when we ought to settle what the Government policy is going to be about the establishment of an American merchant marine.

I sent out last fall this sort of a statement to all my constituents:

An American merchant marine should also be established and maintained, and the Government should continue to build ships and to operate all constructed in carrying our coastwise and foreign commerce. No more Government-built ships adapted to such use should be sold or disposed of.

The Committee on Commerce is trying to determine now upon a recommendation for a policy to be established along this line. They have been having hearings for some time. They are almost ready to come to a conclusion about what they think the Government policy should be hereafter. Before that can be done it is proposed to sell this great fleet, and we have been selling ships that have been constructed at Government expense in Government yards. Why? Because somebody wanted to buy them and because the Shipping Board thought it was good policy to dispose of them. If we are ever to have an American merchant marine now is the time that policy must be determined upon. The Government might be induced, perhaps, to go into shipbuilding at some other time in the history of the country, but it could never be done except under an emergency. We had to build ships while the war was going on. We prepared to build these ships, we made great yards, and we are turning out Government ships, Government owned.

There is a vast difference between the railroad problem and this American merchant marine problem. We did not own the railroads; we do not own the railroads now; and the only question is whether they shall be turned back to their owners. But we have built the ships and we own the ships and we have need for an American merchant marine. That is the condition now. If we shall wait to determine a policy about what shall be done hereafter until the Shipping Board has sold all the ships we acquired from Germany and has sold the ships we built in our own yards at public expense, there will never be a question of the Government establishing an American merchant marine.

Now is the time that this matter ought to be settled and finally disposed of. We know the necessity for ships. We know that no great Government engaged in commerce can live unless it shall have sea transportation facilities. We understood that; it was impressed upon us in the Great War. We have the ships, we have the plants, we have the ability, and the ocean is free to us all and does not need any repairs. This is the time when we must determine whether we shall hereafter engage in commerce upon the sea or whether we shall take care of our own industrial conditions, as must be done even if the Government shall be required to continue in the building of ships and the operation of those already built.

When the last appropriation bill was here providing appropriation for the Shipping Board I introduced an amendment saying that hereafter no more Government-built or Government-owned ships shall be sold, but the Shipping Board shall continue to build them and they shall be operated for the benefit of the Government in carrying the coastwise and foreign commerce under regulations made by the Shipping Board. That amendment was not germane at the time and it was objected to and went out on a point of order. Because it was offered to a general appropriation bill it went out; but the question now confronts us; and if all the Government ships are disposed of before we can determine whether there shall be a policy or not, there is no use to have a policy. Now is the time to determine this question. The necessity was never greater. We are talking about compulsory military training for the Army; we are talking about the great questions of preparedness; but, Mr. President, I desire to say here and now the inevitable conflict for control and supremacy on the sea will be waged within the next 50 years. The American people want to be ready for it and the American people must have a merchant marine. There is one already established now, and it should not be disposed of.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will yield for just a moment, I was under the impression that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] had reoffered his resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. I am getting it ready. It will be introduced in about a minute.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce and to have immediate consideration for the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the resolution be first read. Then the Chair will ask if there is objection.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 305), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, requested to defer the selling of vessels taken over by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the war until further action by Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. As the chairman of the Shipping Board is going to appear before the Committee on Commerce in 10 minutes, I do not know what we may be in favor of, but I do not think we ought to act precipitately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington object to the introduction of the resolution? That is the first question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object to the introduction of the resolution now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. In just a moment. After we hear Judge Payne, then I shall not object to the introduction of the resolution and possibly its consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then will the Senator allow me to introduce the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. So that it may lie over?

Mr. McKELLAR. So that it may lie over until after the committee hear Judge Payne this afternoon?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is all right.

Mr. McKELLAR. The reason I offer the resolution is that within 10 minutes I went to the telephone and called up Judge Payne, and he told me that the sale would be consummated on Monday. I asked him if he would not defer it, and he then said that he expected to be before the committee, and hoped that I would come into the committee and hear what he might have to say, but my distinct understanding of my conversation with him was that the sale was going to be consummated on Monday. My resolution merely directs that the sale be not made until further action of Congress. I think there ought to be such an expression on our part, regardless of whether or not Judge Payne is willing to consummate the sale, for we ought to control that particular situation at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I shall not object to the introduction of the resolution and have it lie on the table, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] stated on the floor of the Senate a few moments ago that he also had talked with Judge Payne over the telephone, and that Judge Payne had told him that the sale would not be concluded on Monday, but that the Shipping Board was simply to receive bids.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to ask if it may be assumed that the distinguished chairman of the Commerce Committee will make some report to the Senate this afternoon as to the result of the investigation before the committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will be very glad to do so, if the Senator would like to hear such a statement. Judge Payne requested the opportunity to come before the committee at 2.30 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be obliged to be on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, but it does seem to me that the situation is so acute that whatever information the Senator from Washington gathers this afternoon ought to be placed at the disposal of the Senate, so that we may take some action this afternoon, if it is deemed wise so to do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall be very glad to present the information to the Senate after the hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to conduct business in an orderly manner. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is introduced. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection. The request is not debatable; it may not be now discussed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a point of order. Does not the objection to the resolution carry it over until to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the rule, as the Chair understands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make the objection with the understanding on my part that the resolution may be called up by unanimous consent later on in the afternoon, if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] should desire to do so.

Mr. LODGE. That is all right.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then it is understood that the objection is for the moment, and that later on I may call up the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that the Senator may submit his request at any rate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has been recognized.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Oregon. Does he yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. A moment ago I called for the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is in the regular order, as the Chair understands. The Chair can not prevent Senators from talking.

Mr. STERLING. Very well; I can not take Senators from the floor, as I understand; but I should like to have the privilege of yielding to the Senator from Oregon, if the Senator is going to consume very much time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say to the Senator from South Dakota that while we are under the regular order now, I shall be out of order in that I shall not discuss the subject that is immediately before the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in December, 1915, and possibly earlier, I introduced Senate bill 1695, to provide for the military and naval training of the citizen forces of the United States. That bill was referred to the Military Affairs Committee, and on the 29th of December, 1915, shortly after its introduction, it was referred to the War Department for the suggestions and criticisms of the General Staff. The Military Affairs Committee of the Senate immediately entered upon a hearing and spent months in the consideration of the bill. On February 24, 1916, a report was prepared by the General Staff, which recommended the adoption of some of the provisions of the bill and proposed certain amendments to other provisions of it. So the subject of universal military training had a pretty extensive public hearing and was fairly discussed before the Military Affairs Committee months before the United States entered the war.

The Senate hearings provoked a general discussion of the subject by the press, the magazines, and individuals throughout the country, and the discussion finally crystallized American sentiment in favor of some sort of compulsory service that would make available the man power of the United States in any war that might thereafter threaten the United States. I think it safe to say that this bill and these discussions made possible the selective service act of May 17, 1917.

I am induced to speak briefly upon the subject now, Mr. President, because of the fact that an article appeared in the Washington Post of this morning written by one of its distinguished correspondents, which indicates that our Republican friends intend to take to the woods on universal military training as our Democratic friends in the other House did on the same subject at the very time when the President and the administration took a firm stand for some form of universal military training, and the President had appealed to the Democrats of the House not to make a party issue of the subject in the following forceful letter only a few days ago transmitted through Secretary Baker:

> I am told that a caucus of the Democratic members of the House of Representatives has been called to consider pending military legislation, and the suggestion has been made that a resolution be adopted committing the Democratic membership of the House against the policy of general military training. In the present circumstances it would seem to me unfortunate to make a party issue upon this subject, particularly since within a few months the party will assemble in convention and declare the principles upon which it deems it wise to commit itself in a national election. The present disturbed state of the world does not permit such sureness with regard to America's obligations as to allow us lightly to decide upon this great question upon purely military grounds while the demonstrated advantages to the use of the country which came from military service in the war plainly suggest that in the national interest quite apart from military considerations the moderate and carefully conducted course of military training may have the highest possible advantage.
> #### APPROVES GENERAL STAFF PLAN.
> In our discussion of the subject, you will recall I gave my approval in principle to the various very moderate training projects suggested by the General Staff, and I would be very glad to have you convey to appropriate Members of the House who will attend the caucus my strong feeling against action by the caucus which will tend to interpose an arbitrary party determination to the consideration which this subject should receive from the best thought of the Members of the House, considering alike the national emergencies which may confront us and the great disciplinary and other advantages which such a system plainly promises for the young men of the country.

I can not believe that our Republican friends, most of whom have stood so long for universal military training, intend to desert the proposition at a time when there seems to be a reasonable chance for the enactment of legislation that will provide for the training of the young men of the country. The article to which I refer indicates that universal training will not be considered at this session of Congress. It indicates that leaders of the party in power have practically agreed upon a commission to examine into and report upon the feasibility and advisability of having the United States adopt a system for the universal military training of its youth. I say, Mr. President, I can not believe that that comes with any authority from our friends on the other side, who—not all, but as a rule—have from the very first, and long before America entered the war and after it entered the war, stood for some system of the training of the young men of the country which would make them realize and would make the country realize that every man owed some service to his country in return for the protection which he received from the Government whenever an emergency demanded his service.

If universal training of the young men of America between the ages of 18 or 21, or fixing the age limits as they were later fixed by the selective service law between the ages of 21 and 30, had been adopted as a policy when the bill for that purpose was first proposed in 1915, our country in all probability would not have been involved in the World War. This statement of my belief is based upon the impressions which Germany must have received from the ultra pacifists in the United States, and she thought, no doubt, (1) that our people, though unprepared for war, would not prepare for war; (2) that the United States would not in any event declare war, no matter how criminal the acts of Germany might be; (3) that if war was declared and an Army raised it could not be transported to the field of operations in time to render efficient aid to the Allies; and (4) if all of these things were accomplished the American soldier would not fight. Who is there that does not know that if 2,000,000 young men had been trained prior to April 6, 1917, when America entered the war, Germany would not have pursued the ruthless submarine warfare which eventually led us into war? Germany would not have dared pursue a policy which she must have known would inevitably drive the United States to war and to an alliance with the Entente powers. If such a policy had been in vogue when war came we could, within 24 hours, have put a trained body of men in the field and the only question in that event to be solved would have been to get them to the field of action. Germany was right when she said America was unprepared, but in each of the other three propositions mentioned she later ascertained to her sorrow that she was wrong.

America was willing to prepare; America could and did get her troops to Europe; and American troops when once arrived in Europe were not afraid to and did fight. As a matter of fact, they were decisive of the great World War.

It took us from the declaration of war until September, 1917, to raise an Army under the selective-service law sufficiently large when trained to make victory on the part of the Allies a possibility and to lay the foundation for the Army to make victory an accomplished fact. Why now abandon the policy which the selective-service law recognizes and has proven to be a practical military policy, modified, of course, to the extent of compelling the youth of our country to train for a few months in one year rather than calling them to the colors for military service for a fixed time or for a time of emergency? Are we to abandon it because there is no war or prospect of war? War is waging in Europe at the present moment and threatened in other parts of the world. It is threatening on this very continent and it is impossible to tell how soon we may be driven to war with one of our neighbors, against whose lawless methods within our borders we are now compelled to maintain an armed force. There is no way of estimating how many lives might have been saved, even if war had been a possibility, if on the 6th day of April, 1917, a million of our young men had been properly trained for military service. There is no way of estimating what a great saving there might have been in money, extravagantly spent in an emergency, and property destroyed as the result of unpreparedness. The best possible way to keep out of war is to let the world know that our civilian population is prepared to defend itself whenever necessary.

The opponents of universal military training are resting their opposition on two main arguments; one, that such training will involve excessive cost, and the other that the adoption of universal military training will commit us to a policy of militarism. It is quite possible to make a system of military training both expensive and militaristic, but, as the particular system of training proposed in the bill now on the Senate calendar is neither the one nor the other, perhaps it would be just as well to consider the main features of the military system proposed therein before condemning it on either count.

The bill proposes that the young men of the country should receive the minimum amount of training required to fit them for service in a citizen army if a great war should occur during the years of their young manhood. For each young man it proposes four months' training at a training camp and thereafter membership for five years in a local unit of the citizen army formed near his home and officered by citizen officers. During this period he will be expected to attend two additional camps with his local unit. This does not involve compulsory military service, for under the terms of the bill the organized citizen army can not be called for military service except in the event of great national emergency expressly declared by Congress. Military service in time of peace and in minor emergencies will be performed by the Regular Army and the National Guard, both of which will be composed solely of volunteers.

The total attendance required of each young man during his period of membership in the citizen army will be about 150 days, or an average of 30 days in each year. Now, as a regular soldier is supported at the expense of the Government for 12 months of the year, and as a citizen soldier, under the terms of this bill, would be at the expense of the Government only one month each year, it will follow that 12 citizen trained soldiers can be maintained for the cost of one regular soldier. This is bound to form the cheapest effective military establishment that can be devised. Under this plan we can have 1,000,000 trained young men living at their homes but prepared for war and organized under trained leaders for the cost of maintaining 80,000 regular soldiers. In other words, as the Senate bill proposes the minimum number of high-priced soldiers and the maximum number of low-priced soldiers, it necessarily involves the cheapest plan of preparedness that can be devised.

In the organization of this citizen army, the veterans of the war in each locality will be invited to enter the force voluntarily for the purpose of forming its first corps of officers and noncommissioned officers. Thereafter, as the young men of the country are trained and join the citizen army, they will receive from their older brothers the benefit of their war experience, and we will thus perpetuate as a permanent institution of national defense the great citizen army which this war created at such enormous cost. This is a proper and patriotic use of those war veterans who are willing to serve for a time in this capacity, and the citizen army plan has therefore received the indorsement of the American Legion. Opponents of universal training are opposing this plan on the ground that we can evade the whole question of preparedness by simply proposing to draft the veterans of the war in any new emergency that may arise. These brave men have done their bit and now desire to help prepare their younger brothers to meet their share of the burden of the future. They can not be expected to look with favor on a proposition that would place the whole burden of potential military service upon them for the next 10 years.

In considering the economic aspect of the problem of preparedness it should be understood that universal training for a citizen army not only proposes the cheapest effective system of national defense but that under such a system of training there will be a positive increase of public wealth—much more than sufficient to offset the entire cost of the military establishment. Under the plan proposed, illiteracy will be corrected and foreign-born young men will be given an opportunity not only to learn English but to enter into a direct association with their native-born fellow citizens. At the beginning of each man's training, pathological tendencies will be discovered and opportunities given for remedial action. With wholesome physical training and hygienic instruction, each young man will take up his life work with improved health and with a resultant expectancy of a longer useful life. He will learn how essential discipline is to all organized effort. Under the system of training, natural leaders will be discovered and their capacity for leadership will be developed as an essential characteristic of the citizen army. The system of training in this way will benefit the entire manhood of the Nation, and the effect of such improvement will be reflected in better morals, better social organization, and increased public wealth.

It has also been argued that the adoption of universal military training will involve the establishment of a militaristic system like that of Germany. Those who present this argument entirely overlook the fact that universal military training is also a characteristic of the democratic defense systems of Switzerland and Australia. If we apply universal military training to a great standing army, officered by an exclusive professional military caste, and controlled by an autocratic government, we do have a militaristic system, but if we apply it to a citizen army officered by citizen soldiers and controlled like other democratic institutions, by the people themselves, we have a democratic and not a militaristic military system. The Senate bill proposes training for just that kind of a citizen army, and as all of our great wars have been fought with an army of that kind, the bill proposes merely to adapt a traditional national institution to meet the requirements of modern war.

Those who reject universal military training on the ground of expense are rejecting the cheapest possible form of preparedness. Those who reject it on the ground of militarism are rejecting the most democratic and the least militaristic system of national preparedness that has ever been devised. Those who reject the patriotic proposal of the veterans of the war that they be allowed to give their younger brothers better preparation for future emergency are really proposing an injustice to men who have already served and done their bit. If the opponents of this bill will consider what it really proposes, if they will listen to the demands of intelligent public sentiment, they will discover that their position rests on bad military policy, bad economics, and worse politics.

The proper training of the young men of the country at some period during the ages prescribed by the bill will bring to them the following benefits:

(1) Physical and, consequently, mental development, because there can be no strong mind in a physically defective body.

(2) Discipline, very much needed in this day and generation.

(3) The inculcation of patriotism and the love of the flag.

(4) The Americanization of the different elements which compose American life.

(5) Democratization of our youth, making the rich and poor learn shoulder to shoulder to perform our country's service when needed.

(6) Vocational training, fitting the man to do the thing for which he finds himself best fitted to do.

And last, but not least, teaching the laws of hygiene and sanitation, so that the young man when he is called into service, or when engaged in peaceful pursuits, knows how to protect himself against the ravages of disease.

I had the pleasure of visiting a few days ago Camp Holabird, in Maryland, where there were from 800 to 1,000 young men, some of whom had enlisted for one year and some for longer periods of time, who are learning the mechanism and building of automobiles. They start in at the very foundation; and, when they get through with their period of enlistment, they are graduated into positions at from $40 to $60 a week, as I was assured by the officers in charge. The young men hardly get out of the Army where this training was being given under competent instructors until their services were in demand by the great automobile factories of the country. I wish Senators who oppose universal military training—and that includes vocational and industrial training and fitting young men for the duties of life—would visit that camp and see what can be accomplished by the American youth under competent instruction, while wearing the uniform of their country.

The reports from the office of the Provost Marshal General and the Surgeon General of the Army concerning the physical condition of the young men called under the selective service law disclose the fact that 21 per cent of the population subject to the provisions of the law were unfitted for military service. These were unfitted for any kind of military service. Think of that, Mr. President! Twenty-one per cent out of the whole of the Army called under the selective service law.

Among the 79 per cent who were found fit for Army life the majority were accepted for "general military service"—that is, for any form of military activity. Another part of the 79 per cent had defects disqualifying them for general military service at the time of their entry, but the defects were remediable and these young men were placed in a remediable group in the hope that their defects might be cured. The remainder of the 79 per cent consisted of men who had defects disqualifying them for general military service, these men being only fit for noncombatant service. To provide for these men the development battalion was organized—

(a) To relieve divisions, replacement organizations, and so forth, of all unfit men.

(b) To conduct intensive training with a view to developing unfit men for duty with combatant or noncombatant forces either within the United States or for service abroad.

(c) To promptly rid the service of all men who, after trial and examination, are found physically, mentally, or morally incapable of performing the duties of a soldier.

The underlying principle of the development battalion was to restore the physically disqualified men so they would be fit for general military service. From reports which are approximately correct the results obtained by the development battalions were as follows:

Total number of men trained in or transferred to or discharged from development battalions was approximately 224,717—just think of it, Mr. President—classified as follows:

(a) Venereals, 77,456 (34.4 per cent of total).

(b) Orthopedic cases, 28,823 (12.7 per cent of total).

(c) Mental conditions, 4,798 (2.1 per cent of total).

(d) Functional heart conditions, 10,917 (4.8 per cent of total).

(e) Miscellaneous physical conditions, 53,540 (23.7 per cent of total).

(f) Non-English speaking, illiterate, morally unfit, conscientious objectors, draft evaders, enemy aliens, and so forth, 33,621 (23.3 per cent of total).

Now, note this:

Of this number of men, approximately 168,583 at the time the armistice was signed had been reclaimed and assigned to some duty in the Army. In other words, these defectives, some of them with communicable diseases, were reclaimed and restored to useful life and sent back to their homes to perform the functions of normal civil life.

What an immense service to the man power of the Nation and to the physically defective who might have become derelicts but for the discipline of the Army and the efforts of the Medical Corps! No one can read the reports of the Provost Marshal General and the Surgeon General without coming to the conclusion that no one agency has done as much for the whole people of the United States as the military service and the experience of 5,000,000 young men in the cantonments, camps, and in every branch of the military service.

In order that those who may be interested in the subject may know where to find this material—and there are thousands of people who do not have access to it—I am just going to call attention to some of the official publications where the information can be obtained. The subject of universal training of our youth may be temporarily sidetracked; but when the young men of the American Legion who are in favor of this system get about among the people of this country and tell them and show to them by ocular demonstration the benefits which were received by them from a brief Army service, this country is going to take up the subject with a renewed and vital interest that will compel our friends to consider this as a part of the educational system of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the line of the Senator's argument if I should ask him some questions for information?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, indeed.

Mr. KING. A day or two ago I received a letter from a very intelligent man who is deeply interested in this question. He seemed to be very much disturbed by the constant averment that the cost of universal military training would be prohibitive, particularly at the present time; and he made the inquiry as to whether there could not be some coordination between the States and the Federal Government, through the National Guard or through the organizations provided by the States, under which this military training could be obtained at less expense than had been suggested by the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As I said in the opening, I intend to discuss this subject in detail from the standpoint of expense a little later on. I am not prepared to do it at this moment; but I will say to my friend, the Senator from Utah, that while the expense might be quite large in the inception of the organization of such a scheme, yet by a gradual process it will reduce the expense to the Government of the United States, because practically there will be no use of maintaining a large standing army in time of peace. Why maintain a standing army when upon a moment's call the citizenship of the country can be rallied around the colors, so that you will eventually eliminate entirely the expense of a regular army?

The figures upon that subject I am not quite prepared to give, but I promise the Senator that I am going to discuss it from that viewpoint, not with the hope of convincing this Congress that it should pass on any legislation dealing with the matter, but in order that the subject may not "die a-borning," as it seems to be the determined purpose of some people shall be the case.

In order that those interested in the subject may know where to find information in regard to it, I call attention to the report of the Surgeon General of the United States Army to the Secretary of War, 1919, vols. 1 and 2. They go into this whole subject. I also call attention to a bulletin printed for the use of the Senate committee on Military Affairs, entitled "Defects Found in Drafted Men. Statistical Information Compiled from the Draft Records, Showing the Physical Condition of the Men Registered and Examined in Pursuance of the Requirements of the Selective Service Act." This latter was prepared under the direction of Surg. Gen. M. W. Ireland by Dr. Albert G. Love, lieutenant colonel of the Marine Corps, and by Maj. Charles B. Davenport of the Regular Army. I challenge anybody to read this report and come to any other conclusion than that the American youth have been wholesomely improved by their service in the Army of the United States. It has called the attention of the American people to the fact that nearly one-quarter of the male population of the United States was physically defective because of some remediable disease, and nothing officially is being done to undertake to improve the physical health of the young men.

Why, Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Utah that out in the western country, when the sheep were afflicted with scabies, and because thereof confined to the territorial limits of the State, and we could not ship them across the line, the States and the Government got busy, and were willing to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to remove this plague in order to place our sheep in such condition that they could be taken to the market; and yet the young men of the State of my friend the Senator from Utah and from my State, afflicted with diseases that affect the whole of our national life, are permitted to travel over this country bearing the germs of disease which are imbedded in every child that is born to such men, and when we talk about undertaking to do something to reclaim and to purify the blood of the American youth we are met with the statement that it is too expensive!

Ah, Mr. President, it seems to me that when we are willing to appropriate money to eradicate the tick from the cattle in the South, scabies from the sheep in the West, and immense sums of money to cure hog cholera and other animal diseases we ought to be willing to expend some money and to enact some legislation to purify the blood of the American youth, and make them fit to live and procreate their species. It is not a very pleasant subject to dwell upon, but you know and I know that parents do not discuss these delicate questions with their children. The family physician does not discuss them with the families under his charge. We allow them to grow up in ignorance, and many of these young men who have gone into the Army learned for the first time in camp life, from the surgeon in charge and from moving pictures and other instrumentalities, the dangers which are incident to these and other diseases, which universal training and a proper education will practically eradicate from the American youth.

Another book to which I call attention is Bulletin No. 11, which is issued from the office of the Surgeon General, entitled "Physical Examination of the First Million Draft Recruits; Methods and Results," compiled under direction of the Surgeon General and dated 1919. That shows the result of the physical examination of young men from every State in the Union, and I will say to the Senate that the results of these physical examinations are simply astounding, if one will only take the trouble to read them. The great wonder to me is that with the youth of this country—young men and young women, too, if you please—growing up in ignorance of the physical structure of the human body, entirely ignorant of the social relations and obligations, and entirely ignorant of the laws of hygiene and sanitation, that they are not worse afflicted than they are now, without any instruction or regulation at home or through the family physician or anyone else. But when these young men get in the Army, the instruction and regulation are compulsory.

There is a general impression that when these young men go into the Army they learn the things that bring to them these diseases. On the contrary, they were worse when they came from civil life than they were in the Army. They were improved by their life in the Army. A major general who commanded a division at Coblenz told me that when his division went to Brest for the purpose of embarkation for home, there were only 12 men in 28,000 that were afflicted with any social disease. What better showing could there be than that? They are instructed for the first time in Army life as to the dangers incident to the diseases which they contracted before going into the Army and while they were in civil life and which are cured when they get into Army life.

Mr. President, that is all that I care to say at this time, except that I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks an article written by Col. Weston P. Chamberlain, of the Medical Corps of the Army, on the subject of "Development battalions." This article shows what the development battalions were for, the class of men who went in, the number who went in and those who went out, practically fitted for military service to their country. I also ask to have printed another article written by the same distinguished medical authority, an officer in the United States Army, on "What the World War and military training have done for the health of American men." There the whole subject is discussed at length, and I venture to say that if people will read these reports they will look at this subject from a new angle.

I ask that they be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPENDIX.

DEVELOPMENT BATTALIONS.

SUBSTANDARD MEN.

The physical examinations of drafted men disclosed the fact that 21 per cent of the population subject to the provisions of the draft were physically unfitted for military service. This means not merely for combatant service, but for any kind of military service. Among the 79 per cent who were found fit for Army life, the majority were accepted for "general military service"—that is, for any form of military activity. Another part of the 79 per cent had defects disqualifying them for general service at the time, but these defects were remediable and such men were placed in a class called the "deferred remediable group," consisting of men who would be suitable for any service after their specific defects had been remedied. The remainder of the 79 per cent consisted of men who had defects disqualifying them for general service, but not sufficient in kind or degree to prevent them from serving their country in the noncombatant and less strenuous branches of the military establishment. These men were accepted for "special and limited service." In the spring of 1918 large numbers of special and limited service men, together with a considerable group of those with remediable defects, were brought into camp. The Medical Department of the Army was faced with the problem of putting these men into the best possible physical condition as promptly as possible. Great numbers were operated upon. At one time there were about 10,000 cases of hernia awaiting surgical operations. Treatment for diseased tonsils, abnormal nasal passages, pathological conditions of the teeth, and defective feet were carried out in enormous numbers of cases. Other classes of men required prolonged courses of physical training to make them fit. Patients who had been ill for a considerable period needed a "hardening" course before they were able to resume their duties. Vast numbers of men with venereal disease, contracted prior to induction, had to be placed under treatment and restricted to camp, yet were not sick enough to necessitate care in a hospital. To provide for all of the above classes of cases the "development battalion" was originated, and the supervision of the medical and surgical features of these battalions was one of the functions of the Miscellaneous Section of the Division of Sanitation.

On May 9, 1918, the War Department issued General Order No. 45, providing for the formation of one or more development battalions for the period of the existing emergency in each of the divisional camps of the National Army, the National Guard, and the Regular Army, and in other camps when directed by the Secretary of War. The function of the development battalions was laid down in G. O. 45 as follows:

"a. To relieve divisions, replacement organizations, etc., of all unfit men.

"b. To conduct intensive training with a view to developing unfit men for duty with combatant or noncombatant forces either within the United States or for service abroad.

"c. To promptly rid the service of all men who, after thorough trial and examination, are found physically, mentally, or morally incapable of performing the duties of a soldier."

On June 5, 1918, The Adjutant General issued an order forming the committee on development battalions, which was to meet with the General Staff. This committee consisted of a medical officer, a line officer, and a civilian representative. During the first two months after this committee was formed an officer of the Medical Corps of the Army represented the Surgeon General's office on this committee for purposes of liaison. On September 9, 1918, Office Order No. 84, S. G. O., transferred the medical officer on the committee from the Division of Physical Reconstruction to the Division of Sanitation, "for the purpose of assuming the duties in connection with the activities of the development battalions, the work of which is placed under the direction of the officer in charge of the Division of Sanitation."

Development battalions, up to this date, had not functioned as intended. Within a short period over a hundred thousand physically handicapped individuals had been thrown into the battalions in the various camps without adequate provisions being made, on the part of either the line or the medical officers, to handle such numbers. Development battalions became great dumping grounds where slightly sick and physically handicapped individuals were collected, together with the venereals, the morally unfit, the illiterates, the non-English speaking, the alien enemies, the draft evaders, and the conscientious objectors. Men were transferred to the development battalions more rapidly than they could be classified and discharged, so that no time was given for the inadequate personnel to carry on the real development work.

In order to correct these conditions, the Chief of the Division of Sanitation established a group of "inspector-instructors" for the purpose of improving the medical work of development battalions. These officers were to travel from camp to camp in order to straighten out the many difficulties. Camp Meade, Maryland, had organized a very efficient system in its development battalions and these inspector-instructors were given a short course of intensive training at this camp. On account of various difficulties, only three inspector-instructors were sent into the field. They visited in all twenty-seven camps.

Through the aid of the inspector-instructors, and as a result of circulars of instructions which were issued by the Committee on Development Battalions of the General Staff, about 15 camps developed very efficient systems in their development battalions before the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918. The men were rapidly classified and transferred, or discharged, from the battalions by securing cooperation between line officers and medical officers. Physical development work was established, and was at all times supervised by the medical officers. Segregation of the venereals from the remainder of the men in the battalions was accomplished. In a number of camps there were established schools for instruction in English for the illiterates and non-English speaking, and for special training in occupations useful for the Army. Recreation, games, and other things tending to improve the morale of the men were promoted, and proved of great value.

Unfortunately, immediately after the signing of the armistice, as a result of the misinterpretation placed upon certain War Department circulars, the impression went broadcast into the camps that all men in development battalions were to be demobilized at once regardless of their physical condition. The morale went down to a very low ebb, and in most places it was impossible to continue any of the real functions prescribed for these battalions in a satisfactory manner.

While the life of the development battalions was short, these having practically ceased to exist two months after the signing of the armistice, yet the principles established by this experiment have been well worth while and will, no doubt, play an important part in the Army of the future. The underlying principle is that men who are, or who become, unfit for full military duty should be reclaimed and assigned to limited service—providing the disability is not of such a nature as to totally unfit them. This is a saving of man power which may be very essential in time of war. This practice may not be necessary in time of peace, but even then it has a humane side which should appeal to all, since, if not needed for military service, the disabled soldier may be put in condition to be of maximum benefit to himself and the community in civil life.

The following figures, which were obtained from the consolidated reports submitted by the several camps and which cover operations from the organization of the development battalions to November 13, 1918, indicate approximately the results attained by the development battalions. Some of the camps failed to submit their final report, and in a few places development battalions were not yet organized, according to War Department orders; consequently these figures are to a certain extent incomplete. It is believed, however, that they are a close approximation and that the percentages given are usable factors; if any error exists it is that these percentages are too low.

Total number of men trained in, or transferred to, or discharged from development battalions was approximately 224,717, classified as follows:

(a) Venereals	77,456	(34.4 per cent of total).
(b) Orthopedic cases	28,823	(12.7 per cent of total).
(c) Mental conditions	4,798	(2.1 per cent of total).
(d) Functional heart conditions	10,917	(4.8 per cent of total).
(e) Miscellaneous physical conditions	53,540	(23.7 per cent of total).
(f) Non-English speaking, illiterates, morally unfit, conscientious objectors, draft evaders, enemy aliens, etc	33,621	(22.3 per cent of total).

From the above total the following number were classified and transferred to service or were discharged or otherwise disposed of:

To Class A (general military service)	41,450	(16 per cent of total 224,717)
To Class C–1 (limited overseas duty)	46,054	(20 per cent of total 224,717)
To Class C–2 (limited domestic duty only)	42,530	(19 per cent of total 224,717)
Total number discharged	36,274
Total deserted	919
Total deaths	1,356
	168,583

These figures indicate that of the 168,583 men who had been transferred to development battalions and finally disposed of at the time of the armistice, about 75 per cent were reclaimed and assigned to some duty in the Army. Of course, a large portion of these were the curable venereal cases. Without development battalions the majority of the above-indicated men, except the venereals, would have been discharged for disability and lost to the military service. Had the war continued for several years the saving of man power by these organizations would have been considerable. At the date of the armistice these battalions, which were a new experiment, had just reached the point where they could function efficiently. In France the development battalion served an even more useful purpose than in this country and resulted in the salvage of many men who had broken down under the strain of military service. This was particularly the case in orthopedic conditions.

On the whole, it may be said that the induction of special and limited service men, and more particularly of the remediable defective group, in 1918 was not very satisfactory. The calling to the colors of the remediable group was soon stopped on recommendation of the Surgeon General. Had the war continued to the point where a severe strain was placed upon our man power, the use of these partially defective men would have been of the greatest value. In 1918, however, our man power was not failing, and the vital need was for speed and the promptest possible mobilization of able-bodied men. The limited-service and defective men took up space in camp that might have been filled with perfect men, and required the services of officers who could have been used elsewhere. They occupied beds in the hospitals which were needed for the vast number of acutely sick and used up the time of surgeons who could have been otherwise employed to better advantage. They proved of doubtful usefulness. Many never performed any service after months of support by the Government, and many others performed service in a more or less unsatisfactory manner. Finally, many of those who were inducted in the above groups will probably ultimately receive compensation from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for defects aggravated by military conditions which would not have adversely affected a physically perfect man.

In any scheme of general military service the physical training and development of substandard men would be of great ultimate benefit to the Nation. Likewise the correction of physical defects and the treatment of existing diseases.

WHAT THE WORLD WAR AND MILITARY TRAINING HAVE DONE FOR THE HEALTH OF AMERICAN MEN.

[By Col. Weston P. Chamberlain, Medical Corps, U. S. Army.]

After the rapid mobilization of nearly 5,000,000 men for the military forces of the United States (Army, Navy, and Marines), the cessation of hostilities at a period in the war when the American battle casualties had been insignificant, as compared with the losses of the other belligerent countries, offers a favorable opportunity to consider the brighter side of war and to estimate what benefits have accrued to the Nation as a whole, and to the individual soldier in particular, as a result of calling to the colors approximately one-twentieth of the entire population of the United States. These benefits are manifold, and may be partially and roughly classified as follows:

First. Improvement in physical development as a result of outdoor life, good food, regular hours, and strenuous physical training.

Second. Detection and cure of many obscure and latent pathological conditions, particularly hookworm, malaria, venereal disease, tuberculosis, bad teeth, etc.

Third. A determination, through the draft examination, of the actual physical condition of the adult male population of military age, and a consequent awakening of the Nation to the necessity for efforts directed toward limiting the possibilities for the continued evolution of physically defective citizens.

Fourth. Instruction in sanitation and personal hygiene gained through both precept and practice in camp. Some of this acquired knowledge the discharged soldier will take back to his home and transmit to his family and fellow citizens.

Fifth. Education in sex relations and in the matter of protection from the dangers attending illicit sexual indulgence. This whole subject really belongs under the preceding subhead, but is such a large and important factor that it has been given a separate heading.

Sixth. Prevention of alcoholic excess by precept and local restriction in sale. This also might be included under the fourth subhead, but it is of sufficient importance to form a chapter in itself.

Seventh. Training in discipline and the development in the soldier of a respect for authority, sadly lacking in the prewar American youth. Among those promoted to commissioned or noncommissioned grade there has been developed also the power to command and to exact obedience.

Eighth. The protection by antityphoid vaccination of 5,000,000 men against the danger of contracting typhoid fever for at least several years to come.

I will now discuss more fully some of the matters referred to in the above subheads:

First. Alertness, activity, strength, endurance, and discipline, combined with a body free from disease, are the first requisites of a soldier. These qualities are obtained largely by a scientific system of gradual and progressive physical training which is regulated to the condition of those who are to undergo it. As applied to the recruit, this physical training has a special technical value in that it does much to perfect him in the military endurance and the coordinated effort by which the soldier is enabled to bear the hardships and overcome the difficulties of warfare. The beneficial results of physical exercise during the training period are supplemented by the outdoor life, the regular hours required, the plain but simple food, the good sanitary surroundings, and the many other features which promote the development of a high type of physical manhood.

Improvement in the physical development of the young man entering the Army has been most striking. Increase in girth and chest expansion is particularly noticeable. As a sanitary inspector I have visited dozens of camps and one of my duties has been to investigate the thoroughness of the physical examination made on arrival of the men at the camp and repeated before the soldier is demobilized. At the first of these examinations the streams of naked men passing me consisted for the most part of individuals who were awkward, narrow chested, flabbily muscled, often with a stoop. Divisions which were being examined prior to discharge from the service presented, almost exclusively, bronzed, erect, broad-chested soldiers, with fine muscular development and a characteristically alert and self-confident air.

Exact statistics on this matter will some day be available, the records of the examinations at time of entrance into the service and at time of demobilization being filed together in the office of the adjutant general, where they are available for study. At present we can only give general impressions and partial estimates as to the degree of physical improvement. Col. D. C. Howard, Medical Corps, in charge of the Division of Sanitation in the office of the Surgeon General of the Army, estimates that the average gain in weight in the first year of military service is from fifteen to twenty pounds. The records of one company of National Guard troops under the semitropical conditions existing on the Mexican border in 1916 showed an average gain of 12½ pounds in nine months. Studies on this subject made by the Division of Food and Nutrition in the office of the Surgeon General, showed in one infantry company an average gain of 10 pounds per man after four months of service, and in three artillery batteries an average gain of 6.4 pounds in six months. Another study showed 2.6 pounds gain in five weeks. There is no doubt that the increase in weight in the soldier is almost entirely in muscular tissue.

On return to civil pursuits the added physical vigor of the one-time soldier should stimulate a desire for more active out-door exercise and should make for better health and a consequent higher type of citizenship.

Second. The physical examination carried out by physicians of local boards disclosed many diseased conditions, some remediable and others not. Similar results attended the examination of candidates for voluntary enlistment in the Army, Navy and Marine Corps. The examination made by the medical officers of the Army as soon as drafted men arrived at camp detected some other men with disabilities which had escaped the scrutiny of local board examiners. Such of these individuals as had physical defects or diseases, which were not disqualifying for military service, received, after entering the service, the most up-to-date treatment to cure or alleviate their defects. Among the most notable examples of this are the conditions due to hookworm infestation, malarial infection, venereal diseases, and deficient and diseased teeth.

In the first million men examined at camp, 2.8 per cent had venereal disease. In the second million 5.4 per cent were so infected, and this figure, for reasons not necessary to enter upon, probably represents approximately the percentage one may expect to meet with in civil life among men of the age period concerned (21 to 30 years). These figures include only obvious cases of syphilis, gonorrhea, and chancroid which were manifest at the moment of examination. Wasserman examinations were not made, nor microscopic examinations of smears except in special instances. Persons who had been previously infected and cured are not included in these statistics. Venereal disease, except in rare instances, was not cause for rejection. All these infected men were treated, and, where possible, cured, during their military service. Many of them, had they remained in civil life, would never have been adequately treated and cured.

An extensive survey was made to determine the presence of intestinal parasites in the Army. Over half a million soldiers received careful microscopical examinations. Among these men, mostly Southerners, 69,508 showed the presence of one or more intestinal parasites, and 56,740 of this number were infested with hookworms. The incident of hookworm infestations among men from the Southern States was 18 per cent. These men were treated during their military service and ultimately returned to their communities freed from the menace of this disabling parasite.

After entry into the service the frequent physical examinations, and the presence of medical officers who were always readily available for consultation, led to the early detection of new or latent diseases, which were at once made the subject of intensive and scientific treatment until the soldier was cured or found to be definitely unfitted for the service. The early detection and treatment of disease undoubtedly saved many men who, in civil life, would have allowed their diseases to go on untreated until it was past cure. One of the most notable examples of this point is tuberculosis of the lungs. Early diagnosis has been the rule and all soldiers with the disease have been sent to up-to-date military sanatoria, where they are treated at Government expense until they are cured or have attained the maximum improvement to be expected. At one time there were 6,300 soldiers under treatment in these sanatoria and for a long time the number averaged 5,000.

The drafted men as well as the candidates for voluntary enlistment, who were rejected for military service, had brought to their attention the fact that they were physically defective. In many instances this fact had never before been known to the individual concerned. When the disability was due to disease the thoughtful individual would naturally place himself under the care of a physician. Undoubtedly many have done this with resulting benefit to the national health.

Third. The initial selective draft of 1917 gave the first opportunity for half a century to make a physical census in this country of the male population of military age. Only a portion of the figures have thus far been analyzed, and any extensive discussion of the subject in this paper would be out of place. A partial analysis shows that out of about 2,510,000 men between 21 and 30 years of age examined by local boards, 730,000, or 29.1 per cent, were rejected on physical grounds. Many of these rejections were naturally due to diseased conditions, often previously unknown to the individual. It is sufficient to say that the completed analysis of the figures will furnish a vast store of information regarding the physical condition of our population, and will point out many lines along which sanitary effort should be directed for the betterment of our national health. The geographical distribution of these problems is clearly indicated. Among the notable differences in geographical distribution of disease may be mentioned the great prevalence of goiter in the Pacific Northwest and the enormous preponderance of venereal disease in the Southern States.

Fourth. At great effort and expense our concentration camps in this country were provided with every requisite for a high grade of sanitation. The medical officers in charge were particularly selected for their experience as sanitarians, and they were assisted by selected sanitary engineers commissioned from civil life in the Sanitary Corps. The camps were models of cleanliness. Crowding of barracks and tents was limited as much as military conditions would permit and ventilation was carefully enforced. Ample water supplies were provided, and the water was filtered or chlorinated (or both) unless its purity was above suspicion. Shower baths were ample and the supply of warm water unlimited. Excellent sewer systems were installed at once in all cantonments, and ultimately in the tent camps also. All food was inspected before purchase and subsequently when put into use. Messes were under constant supervision of medical officers. Garbage was promptly removed and garbage cans carefully cleansed. Buildings were screened to protect against mosquitoes and flies, and the latter were also combated by extensive use of traps, fly paper, swatters and by removal of material in which they could breed. Extensive drainage and oiling projects were carried out in all southern camps, with the result that areas formerly malarious ceased to be so and mosquitoes became rare. Food handlers were examined to detect possible carriers of typhoid, paratyphoid, and dysentery, as well as to eliminate any with venereal disease. Camp laundries were established to launder the soldiers' clothing, and cleanliness of the clothing was enforced by frequent inspections. Under the direction of the United States Public Health Service and the military authorities the sanitary condition of towns and areas adjacent to camps was greatly improved. Vice and liquor selling were abolished or markedly limited. When the soldier left the cantonment and went into the field, in this country or in France, he was surrounded by every device for field sanitation which was known to be of military value.

In addition to the information which he gradually absorbed as a result of daily observation of the operation of sanitary methods, the soldier was also given didactic instruction in sanitation and personal hygiene by means of lectures, pamphlets, posters, and frequent individual advice and admonition. He was provided with a suitable shoe and gained some insight into the advantages of large and properly shaped footwear. His teeth were put in good condition. He was vaccinated against typhoid, paratyphoid, and smallpox. He was frequently inspected to detect incipient or existing disease. He was counseled to consult a medical officer as soon as he felt sick, instead of keeping about as long as he could, and he was impressed with the duty he owed to his comrades if he had any reason to believe that he himself was coming down with an infectious disease.

All this knowledge the soldier will retain and take back with him into civil life. We may expect that he will to some extent continue to be guided by Army precept and practice, and that he will transmit a part of his knowledge of hygiene to family and neighbors. He should be more eager to help to maintain municipal sanitation and to support legislation for adequate and efficient health supervision of his community.

The following figures indicate the enormous reduction in deaths which has resulted from the sanitary measures enforced during the present war, as compared with the results attained by the practices in vogue during the Civil War, the Franco-Prussian War, the Spanish-American War, and the Boer War. The tabulation indicates the actual deaths which occurred during the period September 1, 1917, and May 2, 1919, in our forces, both in the United States and in France (having an average strength for the entire period of approximately 2,121,396), and the number of deaths which would have occurred in any army of the same size for the same period if the mean annual death rates for the Civil War and for the Spanish-American War, respectively, had prevailed during the present war. The figures for the present war are based upon current telegraphic reports which are approximately accurate but may be subject to slight revision on completion of final complete statistics:

	Number of deaths that occurred in present war, Sept. 1, 1917–May 2, 1919. Average strength approximately 2,121,396.	Number of deaths that would have occurred if the Civil War death rate had prevailed.	Number of deaths that would have occurred if the Spanish-American War death rate had prevailed
Typhoid fever	213	51,133	68,164
Malaria	13	[1] 13,951	11,317

[1] Includes malaria and remittent and congestive fevers.
[2] Includes dysentery and diarrhea.
[3] Includes deaths listed from measles, influenza, empyema, inflammation of the lungs and pleurisy, as well as pneumonia.

In the Franco-Prussian War the Germans lost 9,000 men from typhoid fever. With reference to typhoid in the Boer War, Col. F. F. Russell, quotes from Leishman, "Antityphoid Vaccination," (Glasgow Med. Jour., 1912, LXXVII, 408) as follows:

"We know in general that there was 57,684 cases of typhoid and 8,022 deaths among 380,605 men."

The low death rate from tuberculosis in the Spanish War as contrasted with the present war, is due to three causes: First, that the Spanish War was of short duration; second, that the Spanish War period was in the summer; thirdly, and most important, that during the Spanish War all cases of tuberculosis were discharged from the service almost as soon as diagnosed, and so the deaths when they occurred were credited not to the Army but to the civilian community. In our present war nearly all tuberculous soldiers are held in the Army for indefinite sanitarium treatment, and of course a certain per cent will die in the service while the majority are being cured.

The number of deaths from pneumonia is slightly greater for the present war than for the Civil War comparison, and much greater than the Spanish War comparison. The Spanish War rates were low because the war period was entirely in warm weather when pneumonia is infrequent. The greatest cause of the high pneumonia rate for the present war was the pandemic of influenza, a factor which occurs only about once in 30 years. Had this epidemic not occurred the rate would have been much lower than for the Civil War and probably lower even than for the Spanish War. Taken all in all, however, it must be confessed that the secret of the control of respiratory diseases, particularly pneumonia, still remains undiscovered.

Fifth. A program prepared by the Medical Department for the limitation of venereal disease in our Army has been in force for many years. With the outbreak of the World War efforts along this line were redoubled and the scope of the campaign was broadened through the assistance of agencies outside of the Army.

The activities of this program for combating venereal diseases were divided into educational, law enforcement, and early treatment sections. By educational measures every individual was reached, either through lectures, appropriate literature, or moving pictures, or all these methods combined, while especially suited enlisted men were detailed for duty with organizations in order to keep in close personal touch with the soldier and to promote his moral welfare. The temptations to the soldier were further reduced by furnishing him with attractive opportunities for recreation. This work was carried on largely by the Commission on Training Company Activities and by affiliated organizations. Wholesome amusements inside the camp and in the adjacent communities most frequently visited by the soldier were provided to satisfy the longing for adventure and excitement which so often overcomes the discretion of the lonely and idle man in a strange locality.

The Surgeon General assigned especially qualified officers, mostly lawyers, to the law enforcement division of the commission, to see that the Federal and local laws against prostitution and liquor selling were thoroughly enforced. The results exceeded all expectations. In a year and a half about 130 red-light districts were closed at the instigation of these officers. It is estimated that not more than five openly recognized red-light districts remained in the whole United States. Streetwalking and the connivance with prostitution of lodging house and hotel keepers, automobile drivers, and others has been consistently kept down. Trained female social workers, experts in the building and management of reformatories and detention houses, and other civilian investigators participated in the work. Cooperation from the police and health officials and the legislative bodies of the States and cities, as a whole, has been excellent. As a result of these various activities the incidence of venereal disease has been diminished, the entire problem of combating this plague has been brought out into the open, and the necessity for a future campaign to lessen the occurrence of the social evil has been placed squarely before the public.

From incomplete statistics of the war it is shown that of 225,000 cases of venereal disease 200,000 were contracted before enlistment, that is, before the men joined the Army. The record of the Army for cases contracted after enlistment has been good, showing the effect of the combination of the several measures included in the Surgeon General's program.

In addition to these preventive measures adequate treatment has been provided for every soldier infected with this class of diseases, and not only that, but under present regulations men so infected, whether they brought the disease into the Army with them or acquired it after entrance, are being retained in the service until they are no longer infectious to others nor a danger to the community to which they go.

Sixth. The need for protecting the soldier in camp from the danger of alcoholism was so manifest that laws were passed restricting the sale of alcoholics in areas adjacent to military stations, and forbidding everywhere such sale to officers and soldiers in uniform. These restrictions, combined with strict discipline, vigorous exercise, ample amusement in camp, and instruction as to the dangers of alcoholic excess have had their anticipated effect in greatly reducing the incidence of drunkenness in the Army. The further development of restrictive measures resulted in the enactment of laws requiring universal prohibition for the period of the war, and these war-time restrictions doubtless exerted a marked influence in bringing about the constitutional amendment. Undoubtedly the more or less complete abstinence which the soldier has practiced during one or two years in the Army will have a decided influence in promoting temperance when he returns to civil life, regardless of the presence or absence of saloons in his vicinity.

Seventh. I think it is generally accepted that in recent years the tendency of the American youth has been in the direction of disrespect for authority, whether parental, municipal, or national. The strict discipline of military life, with its prompt unquestioning obedience to orders, has developed in millions of young men a respect for authority which can not fail to remain in some degree with them on their return home, making them better material for citizenship. As regards the many who through special ability and force of character attained commissioned or noncommissioned grades in the Army, these men have developed the faculty of exercising command justly and of exacting unquestioning obedience from their subordinates. This is a valuable acquirement which will tend to make them superior citizens, more fully able to direct the efforts of their communities in progressive and constructive policies.

Eighth. Typhoid fever, with the allied paratyphoid group, has always been the scourge of armies and still remains a scourge to civil communities. From armies it has practically disappeared, thanks to the use of antityphoid inoculation. This practice was made voluntary in our Army in 1909 and compulsory in 1912, with the result that typhoid was practically eliminated under peace conditions. The tests of this measure under field and war conditions came in 1911 and in 1916 on the Mexican border and during the last two years in this country and in Europe. In the year 1916 we mobilized what then appeared to be a relatively large Army on the Mexican border, a force which approximated 150,000 men, for a period of about nine months, and in this force we had only 46 cases of typhoid with 1 death. The 1 death, as well as most of the cases of typhoid, were in persons who either had not completed the antityphoid inoculations or else were stricken before the inoculation was begun. During the World War for the period of 20 months from September 1, 1917, to May 2, 1919, the average strength of our Army was about 2,120,000, and in this vast aggregation which was in large part living under war conditions there were only 213 deaths from typhoid fever, many of which were due to typhoid contracted before the immunizing inoculation. Had the Civil War rate prevailed during the World War we should have had 51,000 deaths. Had the Spanish War rate obtained we would have had 68,000 deaths.

In the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps approximately 5,000,000 men have been given the inoculation, and are now returned to civil life protected for a period of unknown duration, but probably extending over several years. These men have also been protected against smallpox much more thoroughly than is the practice in civil life. The value of smallpox vaccination and antityphoid inoculation has been impressed on them, and their experience and advice will doubtless have a decided influence in directing public opinion toward the universal adoption of this twin keystone in the arch of preventive medicine.

In conclusion, I think it may safely be said that the country, as a result of the World War, is in a better situation than ever before to appreciate, support, and promote sanitary reform and adequate health legislation. The five millions who have served in the military forces for the most part appreciate the value of preventive medicine, personal hygiene, and sanitation. They would approve and promote advances along these lines in municipal health service. The men who have been protected from typhoid fever and smallpox will realize that the antivaccination propaganda promotes not liberty but rather license, license for one individual to neglect well-recognized prophylactic measures, and thereby to endanger the health of his neighbor. The experience which the former soldier has had with frequent physical examinations, designed to detect latent or incipient disease, should pave the way for a more general appreciation regarding the value of this measure, which certain life insurance companies have been endeavoring to popularize for several years back.

The extensive antivenereal propaganda carried out by the Army and by the social uplift organizations has at last brought this vital subject into the light, where it has been fearlessly discussed and vigorously attacked on every front. This work should continue and be amplified in civil communities now that the war is over. Along all lines of sanitary and uplift work we may expect militant progress through the development of a better type of democracy, resulting from the intimate association of soldiers in tent and barrack, the rich with the poor, the educated with the uneducated, the virtuous with the vicious, the American born with the foreign born. This intimate mingling, with its resulting interchange of ideas and broadening of mental horizons, can not fail to stimulate in the educated and the well-to-do a greater and more personal interest in the promotion of physical and moral well-being among their less fortunate fellow citizens and in the Nation as a whole. The above-mentioned happy results can not be obtained unless there is aid from those citizens, particularly the women, who did not join the colors. In some directions there is a tendency to scoff at the sanitary precautions taken by the Army and to designate such measures as unnecessary coddling. Such an attitude will tend to make the home-coming soldier hesitate to put forward his newly acquired ideas. The fullest degree of benefit from the war, for the country as a whole, can be obtained only by the close sympathy and earnest assistance of the great mass of citizens who have already so warmly welcomed the returning veterans. The success of sanitation under military control during the building of the Panama Canal was a convincing proof that the health of a community can be enormously improved by the judicious expenditure of sufficient money under a strong central administration, unrestricted by prejudice, political influence, ultraconservatism, or narrow mindedness. The war has offered on a much larger scale a demonstration that public health is a purchasable commodity—the price thereof being not only gold, but also self-restraint, personal sacrifice, and hearty cooperation on the part of all concerned. May the lessons thus learned be not forgotten.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the question of the disposition of certain ships owned by the Government was under consideration this morning, the discussion being precipitated by the joint resolution offered by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. It is my purpose to briefly discuss the resolution and submit a few words concerning the policy which should be pursued by the Government with respect to a merchant marine. I did want to say at the time that matter was under consideration, but the opportunity was not afforded, that I was very much in sympathy with the object of the resolution in so far as it sought to prevent a sale of the ships now owned by the Government of the United States and used for passenger or for shipping purposes, at least until a policy had been adopted by the Government.

I am not a member of the Committee on Commerce, but have given some little attention to the question of our merchant marine and the method of handling the vessels owned and controlled by the Government through the Shipping Board. Soon after the armistice was declared I felt that there should be legislation which would determine the policy to be adopted by the Government. We had spent not only hundreds of millions but billions of dollars in the construction of ships and plants for the building of ships, and the program called for the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars more. Charges had been made of waste and extravagance by the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board, and some of the reports which had been made to Congress indicated that the greatest economy had not been observed by these organizations and that we could not hope for an efficient and economical administration by these organizations even in peace times.

I think Senators are convinced that all agencies of the Government are not only inefficient but are wasteful and extravagant. Our experience with the railroads demonstrates the truth of this statement. It has cost the United States more than $700,000,000 to operate the railroads since the Executive order taking over the railroads was issued.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. To that amount should be added about $375,000,000 of unliquidated damages growing out of depreciation, and so forth. Of course, those are simply claims and they will be very substantially reduced, but I wish to indicate that the $700,000,000 of loss does not include the entire amount.

Mr. KING. I was going to add that in addition to that amount, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, I have been advised that there will be presented to the Government claims aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars. One person who had given some consideration to the subject told me that he had no doubt that claims would be presented to the Government for unliquidated damages growing out of its possession and operation of the railroads to the amount of at least $500,000,000, and that he had no doubt judgments would be rendered against the Government that would exceed a quarter of a billion dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to get the Senator's idea on the proposition I mentioned this morning only briefly, that in dealing with the ships owned by the Government it might be advisable to lease them to the Panama Railroad Co., a corporation now operating a line of ships, and provide by law for the extension of their operations perhaps to other ports if it were necessary to put that in.

I realize that men honestly disagree as to whether the Government should retain the ships, but the Senator must know that one of the items of preparedness is ships, as well as men and guns, and, if we sell these ships, then in case of an emergency we would have to buy them back, and, of course, that would mean an immense loss. Has the Senator ever given any thought to the question of the ships owned by the Government being leased to the Panama Railroad Co. without any possible loss in taking them back the moment we needed them?

Mr. KING. I had given some thought to the subject of the Government leasing the ships to operating shipping corporations or to individuals and corporations who would undertake their operation in a legitimate and proper way.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if they were leased to an ordinary corporation or person or partnership engaged in business and the Government did want to take them back, we would have to pay damages, very properly, for the loss of trade that had been built up, or if the lease provided that the Government could take them without paying damages, then the compensation clause in the lease would necessarily take that into consideration and it would be much reduced. Of course, that would be a loss, anyway, but there would be no use in making any arrangements in a lease with the Panama Railroad Co. or any similar corporation that might be organized, except that it is all owned by the Government. It seems to me that, as I remember it in looking up the history of the corporation several years ago, I was unable to find anything about its operation of those ships that was not commendable. The things that any other corporation engaged in that kind of business would be doing and the objections that are ordinarily made to Government ownership and Government operation, as far as I was able to find, at least, did not exist in that particular case. It seems to me it is something that is well worthy of consideration in passing on the final disposition of these ships.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that it is a matter that ought to be taken into account in connection with the determination of the course which the Government should pursue in regard to its ships.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, there is another idea I should like to suggest.

If the ships were operated by the Panama Railroad Co., or a similar corporation, one object, I take it, would be to develop trade; it would not necessarily be intended that financial profit should be made out of it. In other words, we have the ships; we do not want them to get away so far that we can not put our hand on them at any time we might need them. They could be utilized in building up trade, for instance, between our ports and South America, that everybody realizes is desirable and that business concerns do not go into because of the risk they would run. If we develop such trade, even though we lose money on a particular ship, it might be a matter that in the end would be really profitable to the country.

Mr. KING. There is very much in the suggestion made by my distinguished friend, and I am sure that idea will be developed, or at least it should be developed and given very serious consideration by the committee before it agees upon a plan dealing with this question. I am not familiar with the corporation to which the Senator referred and do not know of its operations, and therefore in the little thought which I have given to the subject I had not associated with the corporation to which the Senator refers the enterprise of taking over the ships of the Government and using them for carrying purposes. There are some who believe that the Government ought to own and operate the railroads, and that the Government ought to own and operate the ships. There are men who believe in the nationalization of industries in the United States, as there are men in England and in Russia who believe in such action in their respective countries. We have men in the United States who believe in the soviet form of government, in the destruction of private initiative, in the overthrow of the splendid system under which our Government has grown to greatness and to power.

I am not one of that number. I believe that the Government of the United States has become great, and the people of the United States have become the greatest people in the world, because of the form of government and the social and economic conditions which prevail here. We believe in individualism. We believe in the right of men and women to work out their own destinies, in a government free from the clammy, tyrannous, oppressive hand of paternalistic and autocratic power. It would be folly in the extreme to abandon the method and system of policies, political and economic, that have made this Nation great, and follow false and dangerous doctrines, which inevitably would lead to economic and political ruin.

Mr. President, it is absolutely impossible in our form of government to secure proper economies in the administration of governmental affairs. Civil service and all other devices have failed and will continue to fail to secure efficient and economical administration of the Government. If time permitted I would discuss some of the causes that produce these effects, but it is sufficient to say that all dispassionate investigators have reached the conclusion that there has been inefficiency and extravagance in undertakings on the part of the Government. In the construction of buildings and roads the record is the same. Whether employees be trained officers or civilians or those who are found upon the list of classified employees, there is but slight difference in the ultimate results.

The highest degree of efficiency and economy result from private ownership and operation of business enterprises. Our Nation owes its primacy in the world to the form of government under which we live and to the individualism which it has developed. The American people have been encouraged to develop initiative and those splendid Anglo-Saxon traits which make a people free and progressive. In a little more than a hundred years our Nation has grown from a mere handful of people until it is the strongest, most powerful, and progressive in the world; its people are the most prosperous and enjoy the highest degree of liberty.

Not only in material wealth but in intellectual possessions, in the spiritual and moral wealth, the people of this Nation outstrip the world. These great achievements have resulted from the repudiation of the idea that the Government and those in authority should control the lives and activities of the people. Paternalism has been reprobated by the American people. The tyranny of socialism has not been accepted, but everywhere in our broad land the people have been taught that the triumph of the Nation as a whole depends upon the strength of the individual units within the Republic. Our scholars, our educators, our teachers, our publicists, our preachers, as well as our political leaders, have cried aloud for the independence of the individual, for the development of self, and for individual expansion. Party creeds have rested upon the proposition of the equality of the individual and of the right to independence, to freedom of thought and to freedom of action.

While there has been regard for social justice and recognition of the responsibilities that follow from association of individuals in groups, communities, and States, and a conception of the obligations due from individuals to each other and to the social organism, the American people have never lost sight of the benefits flowing from self-development and the freedom of the individual. And so we have found the great leaders in finance, in business, in all movements making for progress and the welfare of the people coming from the ranks of labor, from the farms, and fields, and factories, and they caught the spirit and inspiration of this Republic, their latent powers were developed, and their genius and ability made them potential forces for the Nation's development. The great enterprises of the Nation came from the genius of the individual, and our future success depends upon the perpetuity of a policy that recognizes individual worth and personal and individual independence.

It is important that we adopt a rational policy in dealing with our merchant marine. I have been impressed for months with the necessity of prompt action by Congress. I communicated with the former chairman of the Commerce Committee, the able Senator from Florida, and urged that legislation be enacted at an early date that would declare the policy of the Government. I also suggested to the present able chairman of the committee, soon after his appointment as chairman, that at an early date his committee should formulate legislation that would deal with the question. I knew that there were influences at work seeking to have the Government retain the railroads and operate them, and also to retain the ships owned by the Government and operate them, and to have the Government build additional ships for operation. I believed this course to be unwise. I felt that the Government would fail in the operation of ships as it had failed in the operation of the railroads. Investigation showed that the Government had wasted millions and tens of millions of dollars in its shipbuilding program, and I felt sure that waste and extravagance would follow further efforts to build ships and to operate them.

However, I was opposed to the sale of any ships owned by the Government except in those instances in which it was clear the vessels sold would not be required for our merchant marine, and under exceptional circumstances, until a policy had been determined upon by the Government. Accordingly, when it was reported that Mr. Hurley, the former chairman of the Shipping Board, intended to sell some of the ships owned by the Government, I appealed to him to abandon such a course and await congressional action. I am opposed now to the sale of ships referred to in the resolution of the Senator from Arizona, as well as other ships controlled and operated by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, until the future course of the Government in dealing with this important subject has been fully determined upon.

The members of the Shipping Board, though, have a right to insist that Congress act and act quickly in regard to this matter. The members of the board should know whether they are to continue constructing ships and whether there will be appropriations made by Congress to support a shipbuilding program. They can not determine whether to maintain present shipping yards or dispose of the ships. Not knowing what the policy of the Government is to be, they can not determine the character of the ships to be built, if any, or what expenditures should be made by their organization.

The comprehensive powers conferred upon the board for war purposes were quite extraordinary, and naturally, now that peace has come, must cause hesitancy upon the part of the members of the board and uncertainty as to what course shall be pursued. We owe it to the corporations that are handling our shipping matters to advise them at an early date what course the Government will pursue. It is important that they should know whether the Government is to retain the many shipyards which have been built at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars or whether they are to be sold. They must know whether the Government intends to hold a large number of ships which it owns or whether they are to be disposed of. It is manifest that the operation of these ships in some instances, if not all, will entail considerable loss. I know the claim is made that the profits in shipping at the present time are large. That may be true where economies are practiced and where vessels operate along favorable routes. It is, I believe, quite certain that if we attempt to develop our foreign commerce with many parts of the world and the Government is to operate ships for that purpose there will be losses. The Shipping Board must know whether Congress will approve of a course that will result in losses which can only be met by increased taxation to be met by the people. The subject is one so important as to call for the highest statesmanship.

Before the Civil War the policy which we had pursued developed a strong merchant marine. The American flag was found in almost every part of the world, and exports from America and imports to America were carried in American ships. After the Civil War, for reasons that are known to most people, we lost our merchant marine. I have been told by Americans who traveled extensively that often they have seen in foreign ports scores of ships flying the flags of many nations, but no American flag was seen. Foreign ships carried American commerce, and we were subject to the rates and discriminations which the owners of the foreign vessels imposed. In other words, our commerce was largely at their mercy. Such a condition must not be permitted to exist again. We must have a merchant marine adequate for the needs of this country. Our prosperity is dependent upon our foreign trade and commerce. We can not be isolated; we do not desire isolation.

If our trade with other nations were cut off, financial ruin and disaster would come to the American people. Our agricultural products are needed in various parts of the world. We must find foreign markets for our manufactured products as well as for our raw materials. Europe needs our cotton, our copper, our flour, and beef, and manufactured goods. It is vital for the trade of South America that we employ every legitimate means to bring the Latin Republics and the United States into harmonious relations. The products of South America must come here, and we must ship to those nations our surplus of which they stand in need. Notwithstanding the weakened condition of Europe, we will lose in South America and Central America unless we act, and act promptly.

Mr. President, if the Shipping Board intends to dispose of the German vessels referred to in the resolution offered by the Senator from Arizona, or other ships, before Congress has announced a policy for the Nation with regard to our merchant marine, I should be in favor of a joint resolution which would prevent such action.

With my present view I should be in favor of a policy that would call for the sale of the ships controlled by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. But the ships should not be sold immediately or forced upon the market. A policy should be pursued that would bring the Government a fair and just compensation for the vessels. Moreover, all vessels sold should be disposed of to American citizens or corporations organized in our country. They should be American ships owned by Americans, and they should fly the American flag. The sale should also be so made that no monopoly would be created or no shipping trust developed. In other words, the Government should gradually dispose of its ships, but in the matter should proceed in such a way as to develop our merchant marine and strengthen it, and bring a fitting reward to the Government for the expenditures it has been compelled to make in the construction of shipyards and the building of vessels. I sincerely hope that within a few days the Committee on Commerce will submit to the Senate for consideration a comprehensive, rational plan which will prove satisfactory to the American people and under which we may be assured that we will have a merchant marine adequate for the needs of our country.

Mr. President, I have imperfectly stated some of my views upon the question of our merchant marine. Of course, there may a situation develop which may compel, at least for some time, the United States to retain the vessels built and acquired for commercial purposes. Our ships must not be sacrificed, and no private shipping monopoly must be permitted.

The entire question must be considered in a broad American way; the welfare of our country must be of paramount consideration. Until we have made full and exhaustive examination of the subject and agreed upon a safe and rational policy, we must retain the ships.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Keyes	Overman	Thomas
Ball	King	Page	Trammell
Beckham	Kirby	Phipps	Underwood
Brandegee	Knox	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Calder	Lodge	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	McCormick	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	McKellar	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Dillingham	Moses	Smith, Md.	Watson
Harris	Myers	Smoot	Williams
Hitchcock	New	Stanley
Kellogg	Norris	Sterling
Kendrick	Nugent	Sutherland

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The names of the absent Senators were called, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. TOWNSEND answered to their names when called.

Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. COLT, Mr. OWEN, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. NELSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment of the committee on page 2 of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "include," it is proposed to insert the following words:

American employees of the Panama Canal above the grade of laborer, superintendents of United States national cemeteries, and employees under the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, and—

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota upon what theory he includes the employees of the Panama Canal Zone in this bill?

Mr. STERLING. On the theory that the positions of the American employees of the Panama Canal above the grade of laborer are quite permanent and are more nearly analogous to the classified civil service than those of other employees not in the classified civil service.

Mr. KING. How many employees are there there?

Mr. STERLING. I can not inform the Senator as to the number of employees in the service above that grade.

Mr. KING. Have any of the bills heretofore introduced contained any provision under which the employees in the Canal Zone should be given pensions?

Mr. STERLING. I am not sure as to that. Let me say to the Senator that all employees regularly in the Government service and whose positions are quite permanent in their nature might properly be included in any bill providing for annuities on retirement. We have not seen fit to do it in this bill. We have thought the classified civil service designated in itself those who are in the permanent employ of the Government. There are these exceptional cases, some of which are put in by way of amendment, where the positions are in their nature permanent, although they are not in the classified civil service.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator will remember that the employees in the Panama Canal Zone receive certain advantages that the employees of the Government in the United States proper do not receive, and I wondered why this bill was to extend to those employees.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know in what way employees in the Panama Canal Zone have advantages over other employees. The Senator from Utah may be able to inform me in that regard; and, if the Senator will permit me, I do not know that that is any reason why they should not be included in the provisions of this bill. There may be some special reason that the Senator has in mind. If he has in mind any such reason, I should be glad to have him state it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know whether or not the common laborers on the Panama Canal, and the other Government employees as well, are all Americans?

Mr. STERLING. I am not sure as to that, but my impression is that those to whom this provision would apply are all Americans. The laborers, of course, are not all Americans. Probably there are some that are, but they probably are for the most part not Americans. I take it for granted, however, that the clerical positions to which this provision would apply are filled by Americans.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that, not having had time to give the matter examination, and this being the first time I remember the question ever arising as to whether employees in the Panama Canal Zone should be provided for under a retirement bill, I am totally unable to say how many are involved and why they should be in this bill. I thought perhaps the Senator had that information presented to him at the time the amendment was suggested to the bill.

Mr. STERLING. I will say that I saw no great reason why they should not be included in the bill, assuming, of course, that their positions were more or less permanent in nature; and hence, without taking the time to investigate as to the number of employees who would come within the provisions of the bill, I consented to the amendment, and I think it is a reasonable provision.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would the Senator object to giving us the sources of information upon which he based this amendment?

Mr. STERLING. I have just stated that I have not examined into the question of the number of employees, but I think the Senator from Utah knows very well the nature of the employment of those to whom this amendment would apply, and that they are for the most part, anyhow, persons holding official or clerical positions in the Panama Canal service.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice, upon reading the amendment carefully, that it provides that they shall be American employees, and that answers one of the questions that I asked the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. Yes. That had escaped me for the time being, my attention being called to it at this moment.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that all the employees in the Panama Canal Zone are under the civil service?

Mr. STERLING. It applies only to those who are in the civil service in the Canal Zone.

Mr. SMOOT. The same provisions apply to the employees of the Panama Canal that apply to the employees in the United States in the classified civil service.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator give any reason why, while this bill, or one containing similar provisions, has been considered for several years by various committees, no provision was suggested under which the employees in the Panama Canal Zone would be put on the pension list?

Mr. STERLING. I can not give any reason why it was not considered. It may never have been presented, and it probably never was presented, to any of the committees which have had this bill under consideration before. It simply appealed to the committee as a reasonable provision to be incorporated in this bill. We saw no reason why those employees should not be included.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit another inquiry?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KING. I find in the amendment which the committee has submitted the following words:

Superintendents of United States national cemeteries.

They are to get pensions. My understanding has been that those appointments were, or have been, political. Does the Senator say that they have been removed from the political status, and have now been placed in the classified service?

Mr. STERLING. No; I do not say they have been removed from the political status and are covered into the classified civil service at all. I do not say that. I think the reason for the amendment, as it applies to superintendents of United States national cemeteries, is that their positions are considered permanent, and I think they are not subject to removal on change of administration. I do not think they can be called political positions. I am quite sure they can not be.

Mr. KING. As I remember—although my memory is very uncertain—they are subject to appointment by the President.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I think so.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator recall whether that is by and with the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. STERLING. It is not by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They do not come within that class of officials.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator say that the law fixes their tenure as being for life? If the law does not give them a life tenure, then it is clear that they are political positions and that they may be changed at the will of the President or the appointing power.

Mr. STERLING. I would not like to say that their appointments are for life, but my thought is that they are, or during good behavior in their positions. I do not think their places depend upon politics or a change in the administration of the Government.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator understand that they are appointed by the incoming administrations?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, this thought occurs to me: These superintendents would hardly want to be within the provisions of this bill if they were subject to removal with every change of administration, because they can not have served the time which would allow them benefits under the bill. Their minimum period of service must be 15 years in order that they may share in the benefits provided for in the bill.

Mr. KING. That is precisely what I had in mind. My recollection was—and I have a very imperfect one—that there was no life tenure given to these employees; that they were appointed by the incoming administrations, and, of course, some of them were reappointed, or perhaps continued without any appointment. To give them the status of pensioners, under the circumstances, seems to me to be rather inconsistent with the theory of the bill, and might prove a menace to a fair and desirable retirement system. As I understand, the bill proceeds upon the idea that the employees of the United States who have come within the civil-service rules, and have given years of their lives to the Government service, should receive pensions. If temporary and political appointments are to be considered eligible for pensions, then it would seem that the theory of the bill is challenged.

Mr. STERLING. They are probably appointed without reference to the time for which they shall serve, subject to removal for cause, as any other civil-service employee might be.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. NUGENT. Can the Senator from South Dakota advise the Senate whether the superintendents of these national cemeteries are not old soldiers and now on the pension list?

Mr. STERLING. Largely, I think.

Mr. KING. Then I want to inquire further, if the Senator will permit me, as to the other provision of the amendment, namely:

and employees under the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds.

Mr. STERLING. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. KING. The question is whether or not those appointees are permanent. My understanding was that they were usually appointed by the captain of police or the person having charge of the Capitol Grounds, and that the appointments were made as often as a change was made in the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

Mr. STERLING. I think not. I think these positions are more or less permanent in their nature, and do not depend upon political changes or changes of administration. Otherwise the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds would not have asked that these employees be included in this bill, and he did make the request.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit another inquiry? Does not that include the watchmen and the policemen who are appointed from time to time, and some of whom are appointed under the patronage of Senators?

Mr. STERLING. No; it does not include employees of that class.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator indicate the nature of these employees, and substantially the number?

Mr. STERLING. They fill various positions—positions of trust, the position of engineer, and so forth. They are regular employees of the Government and are under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. These are not patronage appointees.

Mr. KING. Is that the only information—and I am not desirous of being critical—that the Senator can give in regard to the number of such employees and their duties?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. The Senator from Utah will note the succeeding provisions of this paragraph. It includes the employees of the Library of Congress and the Botanic Garden. These are not regularly in the classified civil service; but it was thought, because of the permanent nature of their positions, that they could be rightfully and properly included within the provisions of this act. But note what follows. It excludes, first, of course, persons appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and then it is provided that it may be extended by Executive order, upon recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, to include any employee or group of employees in the civil service of the United States not classified at the time of the passage of the act. I think this is similar to the provisions of other bills that have been introduced.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the able Senator that there may be danger in this amendment being an entering wedge to a radical change in his plan, a change which may endanger a retirement bill in behalf of classified employees. It may be regarded as paving the way for pensions for all employees of the Government regardless of service or status.

If pensions are given to gardeners in the Botanic Garden and to employees in the Capitol, to persons having political appointments and serving in temporary or other positions outside of the classified service, it may excite fears that this pension system is too far-reaching, and it may induce the belief that efforts will be made to make every position in the Government a permanent one and one within the civil service. It would seem that if they shall be pensioned we put the stamp of permanency on their employment, and we will be compelled, if not immediately within a short time, to elevate them from their temporary positions of employment and place them in the category of permanent employees of the Government. May it not be urged that this plan will lay the foundation for the establishment of a pension system that will extend not to thousands and tens of thousands but to hundreds of thousands and possibly millions, so that ultimately there will be but two classes of people in the United States—the man who draws a pension from the Government of the United States and the farmer and the laborer and the taxpayer, upon whose backs will rest the burdens of paying the taxes of the Government and carrying the pensioners. Instead of every laboring man carrying a soldier upon his back, as it was alleged was the situation in Germany before the war, every laboring man in the United States may be carrying a pensioner upon his back. I am not making these suggestions in opposition to a fair and proper measure, but for the purpose of having the chairman of the committee consider whether his proposal may not incite demands for pensions of some sort by all who render any kind of service to the Government.

Mr. STERLING. I think if the Senator will read the terms of the bill carefully his mind may be relieved of fear of any such situation as he describes. The employment must be a permanent employment in order that the employee may participate in the benefits of the bill. It must be at least 15 years of employment, so that does away at once with the idea that those who are in the temporary employment will receive benefits under the bill.

The bill provides that the President shall have the power in his discretion to exclude from the operations of the act any employee or group of employees in the classified civil service whose tenure of office or employment is intermittent or of uncertain duration, so here may be those or groups of them in what is termed the classified civil service, and yet if it is determined after all that their service is intermittent or temporary the President may exclude them from the provisions of the bill. Anyhow, there must be 15 years of service before a man can become an annuitant under the bill and he must have contributed from his salary every month during the 15 years.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator's position, it is that a person may not know whether he is a permanent employee of the Government until he has served the Government a full 15 years. When he reaches 15 years' service, then he will know that he is in the permanent service of the Government, but until he serves 15 years he will not know whether he is in the temporary or permanent employ of the Government.

Mr. STERLING. The position of the Senator is that the employee is bound under the law to know that if he serves the Government for 15 years continuously in the classified civil service he will be entitled to an annuity under the bill. He, of course, performs his part by contributing out of his salary toward the payment of the annuity. He will know that and will be held to know it.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator, Do employees of the Capitol, if there shall be any here who have served 15 years, know that they are permanent employees of the Government? Are they permanent employees of the Government or are they only temporary employees of the Government?

Mr. STERLING. If they are in the classified civil service, there is no question about their being permanent employees of the Government, by entering into the classified civil service through a competitive examination and being placed upon the list ready for assignment when vacancies occur.

Mr. KNOX. May I make an inquiry? Is there any provision made for the protection of an employee who might die, say, at the end of 10 or 12 years, having contributed up to that time? Is there any provision made for his reimbursement?

Mr. STERLING. There is ample provision in the bill. His estate or legal representatives receive the sum of all the contributions, with 4 per cent compound interest.

Mr. KING. I should like to call the Senator's attention to a matter concerning which I made inquiry a moment ago, namely, the status of superintendents of United States national cemeteries. Since I addressed my inquiry to the Senator I have hurriedly looked at the statute and find that it reads as follows:

The Secretary of War shall cause to be erected at the principal entrance of each national cemetery a suitable building to be occupied as a porter's lodge and shall appoint a meritorious and trustworthy superintendent to reside therein for the purpose of guarding and protecting the cemetery and giving information to parties visiting the same.

The next section provides:

That the superintendents of national cemeteries shall be selected from meritorious and trustworthy soldiers, either commissioned officers or enlisted men of the Volunteer or Regular Army, who have been honorably mustered out or discharged from the service of the United States and who may have been disabled for active field service.

I was in error in suggesting that they were appointed by the President, and the Senator, it would appear, did not have accurate information as to the status of those individuals. Under the law these employees hold their positions under the Secretary of War. He may name the officials and of course he may change them. Each succeeding Secretary could supersede all who are serving in that capacity and place other persons in their places.

Mr. STERLING. He is not likely to do that, and if he does or if he has the power to do it, he simply deprives the superintendents of the national cemeteries of the benefits of the bill. That is all. It may happen, if the Senator's view is correct, that any succeeding Secretary of War may remove any superintendent, but it would, of course, prevent his obtaining the benefits of the bill.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator feel, if we adopt the amendment which he has offered, that the contention would immediately be made that Congress contemplated that those employees should hold their positions permanently, and that if any Secretary of War attempted to displace them the position would be taken that his action was in contravention of law, and if that position were not upheld appeals would be made to Congress to make those positions permanent?

Mr. STERLING. I will frankly say to the Senator from Utah that I would not regret for a moment that kind of an interpretation being put upon the law. That, however, would not prevent the Secretary of War from removing for cause.

Mr. KING. As far as I am concerned, as long as men in that position perform their duties, I would feel much more in favor of protecting them and giving them permanent positions than I would younger men—those who had not fought to save the Union as these veterans have done.

Mr. STERLING. I think that the Senator will agree with me in that respect. If by law there should be the inducement—not the compulsion but the inducement—for the Secretary of War to keep a man who was efficient in that service, we might well do it.

Mr. KING. If I understand the amendment offered by the committee, the objection which I have to all of its provisions and to its spirit arises from the fact that, as I interpret it, it will be regarded as the foundation for the demand that persons now occupying temporary positions in the service of the Government shall be treated as beneficiaries under this bill and entitled to all of its benefits. In other words, it will be made the basis of a demand to place upon the pension roll tens of thousands of temporary employees of the Government who now fill positions in all parts of our land and the innumerable hosts who are outside of the civil-service law.

Mr. STERLING. I think the bill in that regard is as well safeguarded as any bill can be. I will say to the Senator that many countries require only 10 years of service before the employee will be entitled to a pension or an annuity. The pending bill requires 15 years of service. I think the bill in all respects is safeguarded against mere temporary employments and against the claim on the part of temporary employees that they are entitled to the benefits of it.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator is it not the paramount purpose of this bill to pension those who are within the classified service?

Mr. STERLING. It pertains in general terms to the classified civil service, with these exceptions—those named in the amendment and the exceptions which follow in the original bill providing that the President of the United States may extend the provisions of the act to those whose employment is permanent employment, though they be not in what is technically known as the classified civil service, and a few other classes named in the bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator will pardon me for the apparent repetition, but does he not think if we intend to give the classified service the position of merit and esteem which it ought to have it ought to be perfectly clear that the pensionable status shall not be extended to those who are outside of the classified service, and ought we not further to emphasize the proposition that employees of the Government may not be elevated from nonclassified into the classified service merely for the purpose of getting pensions?

I do not affirm, however, that the granting of pensions to those only who are within the classified service will close the door to pensions to other employees of the Government. It is possible that the hundreds of thousands of nonclassified service employees will soon be knocking at the doors of Congress and availing themselves of every avenue of approach to Congress demanding that the benefits of this bill, modified, of course, in some respects, shall be extended to them.

Mr. STERLING. I think we may be able to meet that situation when it is actually before us. It surely is not in the pending bill. When the President does extend the provisions of the bill to include those not in the classified service, it must be upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission are primarily interested in getting on to the eligible list those who have taken a competitive examination, and they will be loth to recommend for the benefits of the bill any who are not now in the classified civil service or who do not enter that service hereafter.

Mr. KING. My experience with the civil service and my knowledge of its activities and its work lead to a result entirely different from that just stated by my distinguished friend. I believe that the Civil Service Commission—and I do not make this statement by way of criticism, because I think they are sincere in the view which they take—would like to have under the classified service practically all persons who are working for the Government.

Mr. STERLING. But that does not involve the putting of them in the classified civil service. It only involves the recommendation of the commission in regard to certain persons not in the classified civil service, persons whose positions are permanent, whose employment is of a nature to make it reasonable and natural that they should share in the provisions of the bill—not that they come into the classified civil service. It is for that purpose that the provision is inserted in the bill.

Mr. KING. I do not know that the Senator understood my statement or whether I made myself clear. I understood the Senator to say that there would be a check upon the advancement from the nonclassified to the classified service in order to get pensions, that no one could be put into the classified service except upon recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, and I replied to that by stating that my experience with the Civil Service Commission—and I did not say it by way of criticism—and my knowledge of its work and activities led me to the conclusion that it was ambitious to have every employee of the Government within the classified service, and that therefore it would seize upon every opportunity, if its recommendations were to be controlling or, indeed, to be persuasive, of elevating from the nonclassified service into the pensionable status every employee of the Government.

Mr. STERLING. I do not share in the fears of the Senator from Utah in that regard. I said a while ago, and I believe it is true, that the Civil Service Commission will be slow to recommend that the provisions of the pending bill be extended to others not in the classified civil service. They are interested primarily in having men go into that service through a competitive examination.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move an amendment to the amendment offered by the committee, to strike out the following words, commencing on line 1, page 2, "American employees of the Panama Canal above the grade of laborer and employees under the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds," so that it will read as follows if my amendment shall prevail:

The provisions of this act shall include superintendents of the United States national cemeteries and employees of the Library of Congress and the Botanic Gardens—

And so forth.

I give notice to the Senator that I shall move to strike out, after we have disposed of the committee amendments, the words following the committee amendment, beginning "employees of the Library of Congress and the Botanic Gardens." In the amendment proposed by the committee I leave in the words "superintendents of the United States national cemeteries." In view of the fact that they are soldiers of the Civil War and in view of their heroic service, I am willing that they shall get the benefits of this act.

Mr. STERLING. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will not prevail. I think there are good reasons, and I have already stated them, why the committee amendment should prevail in its entirety. It excludes Panama Canal laborers and it is confined to American employees. There is good reason for retaining the amendment as to the employees under the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds. They practically stand on the same footing as civil-service employees or employees in the classified service of the Government. I hope that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota several questions in regard to the matter? The report does not show how many members of the committee concurred in it. I should like to know what members of his committee have concurred in the report?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think all but two or three members of the committee concurred in the report. There might have been four members of the committee who did not concur in the report. In addition to those who were present at the time the report was determined upon, I personally saw, I think, every other member of the committee who indorsed the bill and signified his readiness and willingness that the bill should be reported.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask how many members of the committee were present when the bill was voted to be reported out?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know that I can inform the Senator exactly how many were present when the bill was ordered reported out, but others had been present prior to the time the report was agreed upon by those present in the committee. I think, all told, there were five members present at the time of the action of the committee in ordering the bill reported out. I can give the names of Senators who were present at the meeting.

Mr. POMERENE. I should be very glad to have them.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, let me suggest that the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, it strikes me, is a little unusual, and that the object of the inquiry now is simply to create some prejudice against the bill. I should like to dispose of the bill on its clear merits. I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. So should I; and I do not mean to be in the least offensive in making these inquiries. I will say to the Senator very frankly that there are, to my certain knowledge, three members of the committee who are very much opposed to the bill.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; and I think I know who they are. Is the Senator from Ohio one of them?

Mr. POMERENE. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Ohio is not at present a member of the committee; but let me say to the Senator from Ohio that he was invited to be present at the hearings before the committee and also at the executive session of the committee. I extended that invitation personally to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, Mr. President, that is true; but at a time when I was engaged in other work, and it was impossible for me to be there. At least one other member of the committee has said to me that he had not given the matter enough attention to be able to speak of its merits.

I want to indulge the hope that the eminent chairman of the committee will consent to the bill with all amendments and the report being recommitted. Whether I were for or against this bill, I confess that, as a Senator of the United States, I would not feel justified in voting for it with only the information which is contained in the hearings and in the report which has been submitted. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and myself have given considerable attention to this matter; we have taken such data as are included in the report and in the hearings and we have submitted that information to Dr. Brown, the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, together with other information which we had gathered when I was chairman of the committee; and the conclusions which are drawn by the present chairman of the committee and ourselves are so variant that it seems to me that common prudence on the part of the Senate of the United States suggests that an opportunity be given to the committee, by the employment of proper experts, to determine whether the chairman's conclusions are right or ours are right. If it can be demonstrated that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and myself are wrong in our conclusions, we do not want to stand by the assertions we have made. However, I am going to interpose at this moment a motion to recommit the bill, with all amendments which have been proposed, and the report of the committee itself for further hearings, investigations, and report. I do that as a friend of the cause of retirement.

I do not want to discuss the motion to-night; there are only a few Senators present, and it is a matter of such vast importance that I think Senators owe it to themselves to be here and to determine what they want to do. Upon this motion, if there is an adjournment to-night, I shall ask to be heard, probably for 10 or 15 minutes, in the morning. I do not intend to speak long, but I am going to interpose the motion in the interest of justice, both to the Government and to the employees. It is now half past 4 o'clock, and, if the Senator is not willing to consent to have the motion sustained, I want to ask whether he will not consent to an adjournment at this time?

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. There is an important matter here that I think we ought to dispose of this evening, in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is interested, namely, a resolution in regard to the alleged purpose of the Shipping Board to sell certain ships of the United States. I think it is so important that we ought to try to secure action upon that resolution this evening, unless the Committee on Commerce is ready to recommend some different action.

Mr. POMERENE. I am disposed to agree with the suggestion just made, and for that reason I will yield the floor. I feel very deeply in that matter, just as much as does the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have sent upstairs for the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is chairman of the Committee on Commerce. In the meantime, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed and lie on the table subject to call, if we do not pass it. I will put it in the alternative. I want to be certain that the resolution is printed to-night, unless we pass it. I want to have it in a position where it may be called up the first thing in the morning, if not passed to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where is the resolution now?

Mr. MCKELLAR. It is on the table for the present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator refer to the resolution that was up earlier to-day?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes. It merely requests the Shipping Board to defer action in the matter of the sale of the ships until action shall have been taken by Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I might suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the Senator from Washington is interested in this matter.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes. I have already sent for him. He will be here in just a moment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think action ought to be taken in his absence.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I agree with the Senator, and I have already sent for the Senator from Washington.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it has been my attitude with regard to the report of the Committee on Commerce, to which reference has been made, that if that report were presented here this afternoon while the unfinished business was under discussion, I would ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering that report. Now, however, pending the presentation of that report, I wish to say, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, that I shall oppose any proposition for the recommitment of the bill to the committee, not saying now as to when that motion may be disposed of.

Mr. President, I simply say that the more I have considered the pending bill, what it provides for, what the Government will have to do, and what the employees will have to do under the terms of the bill, the more confidence have I in the justice and the equity of the bill. I am satisfied that here we are on firm ground. Everyone admits, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] admit, the necessity of some civil-service retirement system, and I do not believe anything more just to the Government or more just to the employees can be worked out than has been wrought out in the pending bill.

Of course, we have been more or less discouraged from time to time, as the bill has been under discussion, because so few Senators have been in attendance to hear the discussion and to take into account the statistics which have been produced; but before any motion to recommit is acted on I want to present some further argument and some further statistics in regard to the cost to the Government. I am ready for the present to give way and have the bill temporarily laid aside, pending the report of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am advised by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] that he is not at this moment ready to proceed. I simply wish to say that I am just as earnestly in favor of some proper scheme of retirement as is the Senator from South Dakota; our investigation has brought us to the same conclusion in that behalf; but I differ completely from the Senator in his statement as to the justice or equity of this bill. I should like the opportunity if I could—and I know that other Senators on the committee would like to have such an opportunity—to cross-examine some of the expert actuaries, and it would be most interesting, from a legal standpoint, to hear what they might have to say in answer to some questions. But the Senator from Tennessee is now ready to proceed, and I will yield.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, is now present. I wish to say to him that I have asked unanimous consent at once to bring up the resolution in regard to the proposed sale of certain ships, and would like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think I can make a statement that will be satisfactory to the Senator from Tennessee. The committee has been considering the matter involved in his resolution. Judge Payne has stated to the committee that the assertion that the Shipping Board has agreed or promised to sell all these 30 ships to one company—the International Mercantile Marine Co.—is absolutely baseless and untrue; that, to the contrary, the Shipping Board has formally passed a resolution to the effect that they will not sell all of these ships to one company. That disposes of that proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Did Judge Payne say that they really intended to sell the ships at this time at all?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was just going on to make a statement with regard to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Bids have been received upon 20 individual ships from, I believe, 12 different companies and corporations. The Shipping Board, however, has not accepted any of those bids; on the contrary, it has called for additional bids, or has decided to hold what is called an auction on next Monday. This will be not an auction in the ordinary sense, where if there is more than one bid the sale must be made to the highest bidder, but it is simply designed to give everybody an opportunity to come in and submit proposals for the purchase of the 20 ships. The bids submitted will amount to proposals, the board reserving the right to reject them all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are public, open proposals?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; open proposals, which anybody who desires may submit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Submitted in the presence of the other people, who will have an opportunity to submit higher bids at once?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is the reason they call it an auction.

Mr. KING. And bids may be made separately or for the entire number of ships; that is, an individual may bid for one ship or for more than one?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Or for 20 ships.

Mr. KING. For the entire number?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. The Senator was not here when I made the statement that Judge Payne had stated that there is absolutely no foundation for the statement that the board has agreed to sell all of these 30 ships to one company, but that, to the contrary, the board has passed a formal resolution that it will not sell all these ships to one company. Open bids, as the Senator from Georgia suggests, which may be submitted by everybody—and they can be raised, and so forth—will be received on Monday; but the Government will not be bound to accept any of them, and they will not be accepted at that time, but after they are received, then the Shipping Board will give them careful consideration, taking into account all the conditions and circumstances. Judge Payne has assured the committee that no action will be taken, but that he will appear before the committee and present all the facts and all the circumstances, the bids and everything of that sort, upon the request of the committee, and will not act in any way until the committee has had ample time to consider these matters. The committee felt that we could then get much better information even than we have had to-day; that we would know all the facts in the whole situation as developed by the bids, and then the committee could make its recommendation.

Judge Payne further assured the committee that if the Senate or the committee should pass a resolution and send it to him expressing it as the sense of the Senate, or of the committee alone, that this sale should not under any circumstances be consummated, he would not consummate it. So it seems to me the matter is left where it will be open for the action of the committee or of the Senate after we have gotten all of the facts and all of the conditions and these new proposals, if there are any made, are known.

It was the sense of the committee that the wisest thing under the circumstances to do was to wait, let the bids be received on Monday, and then probably call Judge Payne before the committee on Tuesday. Under those circumstances——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was present at the greater part of the hearing, but I was not present at that part of the hearing where Judge Payne gave the assurance that no sale would be perfected until the committee had been consulted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Until the committee had had full opportunity to consider the whole matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I heard him express very vigorously the opinion that the ships ought to be sold.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; he did that.

Mr. McKELLAR. And that he felt the Shipping Board, rather than the Congress, should be allowed to exercise its views, as I understood him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not understand him quite to that effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. But that, if requested by the committee to hold it up, he would do so. I did not understand, however, that he was to hold it up until he came before the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; he assured us that he would do so. That proposition was presented to him, I think, while the Senator was there.

Mr. McKELLAR. To be absolutely on the safe side, does the Senator see any objection to a resolution being passed by the Senate, by unanimous consent, asking him to do so?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in view of the positive assurances of Judge Payne, I feel that in a way it would really be a reflection upon him.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; quite the contrary. He asked that the committee do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; he did with reference to the sale or disposition, but we asked Judge Payne if there was any reason why action should not be delayed until he had received all these proposals and bids, and so forth, and then have him come to the committee, and he said no. Then the committee asked him——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. To quiet the apprehension of Senators, I want to state that Mr. Hearst has filed a bill of complaint here to enjoin the Shipping Board from proceeding with these sales, and that the order to show cause is returnable on the 16th.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I was going to state that, also.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was the injunction granted?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The court has issued an order to show cause why they should not be enjoined, but I do not see any reason why that should particularly influence us. Judge Payne has assured us that he will do nothing without conferring further with the committee, and it does seem to me that that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. McKELLAR. My only purpose is to make it absolutely certain that there can not be any mistake about it—that these ships will not be sold by the Shipping Board until Congress has passed on the matter, because I think that ought not to be done. If the Senator is absolutely certain from the assurances he has received that that will not be done, it is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am sure of that, and I am satisfied that I can be just as sure of it now as I could be if a resolution on the subject were passed by the Senate, because the passage of a resolution does not add anything to the power of Judge Payne, nor does it take anything away from him. He has assured us that he will not sell the ships without conferring with the committee, and I am satisfied that his word is just as good as any resolution passed by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under those circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that my resolution may be printed and lie on the table in the usual way, unless there is objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

RECESS.

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, February 14, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 13, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father Soul, whose home is in the soul of man if he will,

"Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me."

Let Thy kingdom come in all our hearts, that whatsoever we put our hands to this day we may honor ourselves and hallow Thy name. In the spirit of the world's Great Exemplar. Amen.

MR. O'CONNOR'S LINCOLN DAY ADDRESS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a Lincoln Day address delivered in the Soldiers' and Sailors' Memorial Hall at Pittsburgh, Pa., last evening to the Veteran Guard of Allegheny County, Pa., by our colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a Lincoln Day address delivered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALE OF GERMAN SHIPS.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Mr. John Barton Payne, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, with reference to the sale of the German ships.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Judge Payne, of the United States Shipping Board, relative to the sale of the German fleet. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1920.

Hon. JAMES M. MEAD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MEAD: Answering your inquiry re sale of the ex-German passenger ships, the reasons were principally these:

(1) It is the opinion of the Shipping Board that we will probably not be able to operate passenger ships under prohibition successfully in competition with foreign ships which sell liquor.

The reason why is: In December we fitted out the Moccasin to sail to South America. Her berths were all sold. When I announced that, in view of the policy of the Congress of the country, Government ships would not be permitted to sell liquor, one-half of the sailings were immediately canceled.

(2) We advertised the ex-German ships, and for 20 were offered $20,000,000. We had a careful calculation made as to the cost of reconditioning these ships for passenger service, and this reached the sum of $57,000,000. In view of the present situation, it did not seem to us that we were justified in incurring so large an expense.

(3) Conditions in the shipping world are such that it is our conviction that there will never be a time when we can sell ships to better advantage than now, and since it is our conviction that the ships can be successfully operated in private ownership, we believe the sale should be made.

(4) Two conditions are insisted upon by the board:

(a) That the ships shall remain under the American flag.

(b) That they are to be sailed in the routes indicated by the Shipping Board. This, we believe, will adequately protect the United States.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN BARTON PAYNE, Chairman.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending Agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the pending Agricultural appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, H. R. 12272, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] had offered an amendment to the paragraph in line 5, page 69.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIBRARY, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

SALARIES, LIBRARY, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE: One librarian, $2,000; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 6 clerks, class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,080 each; 3 clerks, at $1,020 each; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 messenger, $720; 1 messenger boy, $660; 3 messenger boys, $600 each; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; in all, $32,880.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture a question, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the chairman of the committee the necessity for this large number of employees for the Agricultural Department library?

Mr. HAUGEN. The Agricultural Department estimates that that number is necessary. Of course, the gentleman appreciates that the department has a large library. As the gentleman knows, a large majority of all the scientifical employees of the Government are under the Department of Agriculture. The library contains a large collection of scientific works.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it a fact that we are to permit the scientists in the Agricultural Department to depend entirely upon a separate, distinct library in that department when they have access to one of the finest libraries in the world, the Congressional Library, and to the numerous other comprehensive libraries here in Washington?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman appreciates the necessity of a library in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; to a reasonable limit. Every lawyer must have a library and every doctor must have a library, and so must every scientist.

Mr. HAUGEN. And necessarily there is and must be a large library in the Department of Agriculture. There are a large number of publications that have to be translated.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it the disposition of the Agricultural Committee to give the Department of Agriculture what is known as a complete library?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; only a special library, containing such books as are needed for the work of the department in order to save the employees of the department the time and expense of going to the Congressional Library.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks made yesterday on the subject of tobacco and barberry bushes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimouse consent to revise and extend the remarks which he made yesterday on the subject of tobacco and barberry bushes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For cooperative agricultural extension work, to be allotted, paid, and expended in the same manner, upon the same terms and conditions, and under the same supervision as the additional appropriations made by the act of May 8, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 372), entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefit of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," $1,500,000; and all sums appropriated by this act for use for demonstration or extension work within any State shall be used and expended in accordance with plans mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the proper officials of the college in such State which receives the benefits of said act of May 8, 1914.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. SNELL: Page 74, line 8, strike out "$1,500,000" and insert "$1,000,000."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment purely in the interest of economy. I believe in giving each department a reasonable amount to do the work that it is called upon to do, but I feel that under the present conditions if we give the department as much money as it had last year and in view of the fact that the number of institutions which they are running now are 25 per cent less than last year, we are giving them all that they are entitled to ask for at the present time.

I have read the hearings on this item very carefully, and if I can draw any conclusion from the questions asked by the subcommittee having this item in charge I am fully convinced that they did not believe that this item was necessary to insert in the bill at this time. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the money that is appropriated for this work and to the condition of it at the present time, and I am sure that if they are honest in their desire for economy they will adopt this amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Just for a short question.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman on this, and I hope he will succeed, but I am sure he will not succeed unless he gets the chairman of the committee with him.

Mr. SNELL. Under the Smith-Lever Act last year there was appropriated for this work $3,080,000, and then in the regular Agricultural appropriation bill $1,500,000, making the total amount for the work $4,580,000. This year there is an automatic increase of this amount under the Smith-Lever Act of $500,000, and the committee have carried the same amount in this bill as was carried for the current year, so that if we adopt it as carried by the committee we would have for this work this year $5,080,000, or $500,000 more than was carried this year, which seems to me entirely unnecessary. I am not opposed to the work, but am opposed to giving any bureau more money than they had last year, and considering the present condition of the Treasury we should not do it. But if you adopt my amendment that I have offered you will have the same amount of money that is appropriated for the current year.

Let me tell you the condition that exists. According to the testimony, in 1918, there were 2,435 county agricultural agents and 1,750 home demonstration agents. In December, 1919, or practically the present time, there were only 1,999 county agricultural agents and 815 home demonstration agents. Therefore, there is an actual decrease in the field operations of this organization of about 25 per cent. If we give them the same amount of money this year that we gave last year, we are giving them more in proportion with the number of agricultural agents and home demonstration agents than they had last year, and that is all they ought to ask for, considering the present condition of the Treasury.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman states that there is a material decrease in the county agents. I want to know if the gentleman knows why.

Mr. SNELL. From the testimony it was said that it was because the various counties were not interested in coming forward and putting up their part of the money.

Mr. PURNELL. It was because they could not get money enough to hire competent men.

Mr. SNELL. The testimony is that they are not interested enough in the work to put up their share of the money. That is the testimony given by the director in your hearings. When we are giving any one department as much money as they had last year and they have less men in the field, we are dealing fairly with that department of the Government. We have 776 special agents, costing over $2,500,000, and if we carried out the wishes of the department you would have 1,500 agents, costing $6,000,000. I claim that we are dealing honestly with the department, and I hope that my amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate may be closed, and I want to see how much time is wanted.

Mr. PURNELL. This is the most important item in this bill, and it ought not to be passed over without some serious discussion and consideration. I do not think we ought to have less than 40 minutes' debate, and that is entirely too small.

Mr. HAUGEN. I just want to have the time limited and see how it shall be divided. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close at the expiration of one hour.

Mr. PURNELL. Reserving the right to object, let me ask the chairman as to the division of time.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Georgia will have 10 minutes——

Mr. PURNELL. I do not want 40 minutes used against the provision and only 10 minutes for it. I think the time ought to be equally divided between those who are for and those who are against. Will not the gentleman couple with his unanimous-consent request a request that the time be divided equally and half be controlled by the gentleman from New York and half by those in favor of the paragraph?

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in one hour, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the other half by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in one hour, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and one-half by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is the most important provision in this bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], who makes this motion to reduce this appropriation from one million and a half dollars to a million dollars, says that he makes it in the interest of economy. I want to say to you as a member of the Committee on Agriculture that I do not believe any member of our committee did more than I did, in my feeble way, to consistently reduce the appropriations. And I want to say here that we resolved every doubt in favor of economy, and I suspect that in some instances in this bill, in our earnest endeavor to keep down appropriations and avoid an additional bond issue, we may have to some small extent crippled the great agricultural interests of the country.

This bill only carries, in round numbers, $30,000,000 for all the agricultural work of the United States. And, strictly speaking, all of the appropriations in this bill are not properly a part of the Agricultural Department work. The estimates sent in by the bureaus amounted to $11,558,204 more than we report in this bill. It carries $7,132,823 less than the Secretary of Agriculture asked for and $3,359,727 less than we appropriated for the year 1920, so that we have really pruned the estimates.

But I want to say to you gentlemen that while we are talking economy—and I believe in it—we must not cripple the one thing that will do more to encourage production in this country than any other thing, namely, the continuation of this work. I think I know something about it. The State of Indiana is perhaps as far or farther advanced than any other State in the Union in this agricultural extension work. I believe that my own county and district are just a little bit ahead of any other county and district in the United States, if I may be pardoned for making the statement. I know something of the progress made since 1914, when the Smith-Lever Act was passed, and I say to you the Government is doing nothing comparable with this agricultural extension work.

The report of the Committee on Agriculture shows that if this bill is passed as recommended by the committee the Federal contribution for the extension work next year will be $6,430,520, and the offset required of the States by law will be $4,600,000, making a total of $11,030,520. This includes an additional Federal contribution under the Smith-Lever Act of $500,000; but the States are at present not only meeting this addition with their offsets but are also appropriating approximately $4,200,000 to this work beyond the required offsets.

If the States and the counties do as well next year as they are doing now—and there is every reason to believe that they will—the Federal contribution of $6,430,520 will be offset by about $7,820,000.

The $500,000 additional Smith-Lever money spent in the counties on the basis of $600 toward the salary and expenses of each extension agent would serve as a strong incentive for the further development of this work; and experience shows that such contributions, though small in amount, are often the deciding factor in the employment of agents by the counties. This amount would provide the usual Federal contribution of $600 for—

County agricultural agents, 400, at $600	$240,000
Home demonstration agents, 250, at $600	150,000
Club leaders, 180, at $600	108,000
	498,000

We should then have a reasonable prospect that during the next fiscal year 2,400 counties out of a total of about 2,860 agricultural counties would have a county agricultural agent. One thousand and fifty of these counties would also have a woman agent and 360 counties would have a club leader.

There are many good reasons why efforts should be made to further develop the system of practical education and assistance for our farming people, which has been built up so effectively since the passage of the Smith-Lever Act of 1914, and it already has the support and active interest of a large share of our farming people. There is very great need, on behalf of the general welfare of all our people, that the farmer should have all possible encouragement to keep up and even increase production of food and other agricultural products needed in our industries. They are at present laboring under great difficulties, and unless they have all available knowledge and assistance put at their command there is very great danger that agricultural production will seriously decline, with resulting increased cost of living and great industrial embarrassment.

Beyond this it is very evident that the movement of population from the farms to the cities will be accelerated, with very disastrous results, unless we can make agriculture a more attractive industry for our young people and the conditions of country life more attractive to the farm women and children.

The great strength and importance of the extension system lie in the fact that it not only aids the farmer in the production of crops and animals but also helps him to market them most economically and profitably; aids the farm women in lightening their burdens through labor-saving devices and more convenient arrangement of their household equipment, improvement of the water supply and sanitary conditions in the home, and a better understanding of the diet and other things required for the best life of their children and other members of the family; and, through the boys' and girls' clubs, interesting young people in the work of the farm, giving them a share in its profits and helping them in many ways to see the advantages of country life.

This system of practical education makes available to the men, women, and children on our farms whatever knowledge is possessed by our agricultural institutions which will help them to make farming more attractive and profitable and country life more satisfactory. At the same time it takes advantage of all the results of the experience of the best farmers, multitudes of whom are already participating in the demonstrations and other forms of extension work. More and more the farming people themselves, through their farm bureaus and other similar organizations, are taking part in the planning and conduct of this work. It is their enterprise, and they want it developed and strengthened to meet their needs more fully.

Whether this work is crippled or not, whether we keep this million and a half dollars in this bill or cut it all out, my county and my district will continue to carry on this work, if the farmers and those who are interested in it have to go down into their pockets and provide the money. Here is the situation with which we are confronted in this country, and it is a serious situation. Four million men went out of the homes of America to fight the battles of this Republic. Many of them went from the farms, and when they got into the concentration camps of this country and in Europe they became enamored of that association, that life, with its companionships and friendships, to such an extent that when the war was over those boys who had been raised on the farms of this country were loath to go back to the quietude of the farm.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman pretend to say that any of these men provided for in this item will go back to do any work on the farm?

Mr. PURNELL. If the gentleman will wait, I will come to the point. Perhaps I am a little slow in reaching it. What we want to accomplish is this: We want to encourage the boys and the girls of the United States, who are growing up on the farms, to stay there. I suspect we will not get back on the farms all of the splendid young men of this country who left the farms and joined the Army, who now have a desire for the bright lights of the city, and for the companionship of their old friends, but we will help hold those who are there. Production is the thing that is needed in this country, and if we are to produce more and reduce the cost of living and return to a normal condition and a sane basis in this country, we must in a big way encourage a great movement back to the soil. [Applause.]

What is being done in this work? There are 31 State leaders of county agricultural agents, 78 assistant State leaders, nearly 2,000 county agricultural agents, 29 State leaders of home-demonstration agents, 203 assistant State home-demonstration agents, 225 county home-demonstration agents. There are 22 State leaders of boys' and girls' clubs and 230 county club leaders. We have in this country in round numbers 3,000 counties. Two thousand eight hundred and sixty of those are what are known as agricultural counties, and all we have been able to get interested in this agricultural extension so far are 2,000 counties. There are 860 counties in the United States that have not yet been touched by this agricultural-extension work. Everyone knows that the cost of living has increased and it has affected everybody. It has increased $1,000 per county in this work during the last five years. Fifty per cent of the county agricultural agents quit each year because they can get more money, because the concerns over the country who recognize their value and the need of having their services have taken them out of these counties so that we have to contend with that proposition.

The reduction of funds has resulted in bringing down the number of counties having county agricultural agents from 2,400 to 2,000, a loss of 400 counties. The number of counties having women agents, commonly known as home-demonstration agents, has declined from 1,700 to 830. The number of counties having county leaders of boys' and girls' clubs has also materially decreased, and there are at present club leaders in only 281 counties, as compared with twice that number a year ago.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], who offers this amendment to decrease the appropriation provided for in this bill, says that we have had a loss of demonstration agents and county agricultural agents and club leaders. Of course we have. It was inevitable, and we will lose many more if we are compelled to continue this work with the same amount of money as last year. I will say to the gentleman from New York, who is so much concerned about economy, that the Agricultural Committee gave very careful and earnest consideration to this proposition. We heard the testimony before our committee, and after careful consideration decided that in the interest of greater production in the country it is necessary to have this amount of money, that the work will go back, and the great service, so successfully inaugurated, be crippled if we do not have it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Did the whole committee give more attention, more careful consideration to this than the subcommittee?

Mr. PURNELL. They gave as careful——

Mr. SNELL. Did they give as careful or as much attention?

Mr. PURNELL. Of course, the gentleman knows——

Mr. SNELL. Of course, the gentleman knows they did not. The subcommittee reported against it.

Mr. PURNELL. Let me say this: We had some very high-class gentlemen before our committee, some from my State, men who are as much interested in conserving the money of this country as the gentleman is or as I am, and they gave us some valuable information, and because of that information and their suggestions we were able to intelligently reduce many items in this bill; but they said to us, and it was not from a selfish motive at all, that to decrease this appropriation would be to cripple the entire agricultural interests of the United States, and I believed them. I want to say to the gentleman that as one member of that committee I think I gave just as much attention to this provision as did the subcommittee.

Mr. SNELL. I asked the gentleman about the whole committee.

Mr. PURNELL. And that applies to the whole committee.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. How many agents does this appropriation provide for? Does it provide for a county agent, a home demonstration agent, and a club leader in each of these counties?

Mr. PURNELL. It does contemplate that, yes; and it is very essential that they be continued.

Mr. MADDEN. Does it not require also that every time we put on one through this appropriation the county to which he is assigned has to put another on?

Mr. PURNELL. Oh, of course, the county has to pay part of the expense, as well as the Federal Government.

Mr. MADDEN. And most of the counties are getting tired of it.

Mr. PURNELL. I think the opposite is true. In my county—and this is true of almost 2,000 counties in the United States that are agricultural counties—they have organized boys' and girls' clubs that are raising pigs and calves and corn, the members of which are being given an interest in the profits from the raising of those things. A little girl from my county just the other day took a calf to Chicago which won the national sweepstakes. She is interested in farming and stock raising, and the boys are interested in it, and they are being encouraged not only in a financial way, but they are being encouraged in an agricultural way to take an interest in the farm and to stay on the farm.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Why can not the county farm agents also act as club leaders? I know a number of counties with county farm agents where they are acting as such. Why have two Government agents there?

Mr. PURNELL. If the gentleman had been before our committee, he would have seen that everybody who came before it said, "Let the county agent do this and that." A good, live county agent has his hands full and earns a great deal more than he really gets.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PURNELL. I do not yield just now. I want to make a statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask a question for information.

Mr. PURNELL. I can not refuse my good friend from Illinois, the new watchdog of the Treasury, and I may say in all seriousness a good one.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will be kind enough to tell the committee what percentage of this appropriation is going to county agents?

Mr. PURNELL. I can not tell without looking up the figures. Besides, there seems to be some dispute about that.

Mr. SNELL. Allow me to answer that.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman from New York has about 25 minutes left, and can answer it in his own time.

Let me state what was done in 1918, the last year for which we have the figures, by these agricultural agents. Seventy-seven thousand six hundred and sixty-eight demonstrations incident to crop and live-stock production were had, and these demonstrations were visited by 677,653 persons, and the increased profits to the farmers on whose farms they were conducted, due to better practice, amounted to $22,206,307, or more than five times the total cost of the work that was done.

Now, I ask you gentlemen if that work was profitable? The total value of the cooperative business conducted by farmers' exchanges and other associations organized with the aid of the county agents in this and preceding years amounted to $41,847,783, a saving to the farmers, effected through these organizations, of $4,500,000. The home demonstration agents brought about the home canning of 24,000,000 quarts of fruits and vegetables. The 250,000 boys and girls who made a complete report on their work produced $6,000,000 worth of products, with a profit of $3,500,000, while the total supervisory cost of all the crop work in which all of these 527,000 boys and girls were enrolled was only $547,000. Now, gentlemen, in the interest of a false economy, in the interest of a desire to make a record, you are asked to cripple this work and give a setback to the one vital organization in this country that will increase production; and I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] will not be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the speech made by my good-looking friend from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL], and I——

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman pardon me for just a minute? I would like to know how much time I consumed, so that I will know how to apportion the balance of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used 15 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. It was very interesting to listen to the gentleman from Indiana, as he is always genial, cordial, and accommodating, but I do not believe he presented a case that would justify the appropriation which is sought to be eliminated from this bill.

In the first place, the gentleman has said that the war had attracted the boys away from the farm, and then he presumes to say that you are not going to be able to get them back, and leaves the impression on your minds, without saying so, that if we appropriate this $500,000 that that is going to take the place of the boys who have left the farm. No such thing. Now, let us see what the percentage of the appropriations made by the Government of the United States is that goes to those who are engaged in the work for the counties. The total appropriation is $14,253,940, which is made for the work, and $1,285 is allowed for each county agent. In 2,000 counties that makes 18 per cent of the Federal appropriation, and the other 82 per cent is lost on the way, paid to men who have no relation to the farm at all. Now, what advantage is there to the farm by any greater appropriation? The more you add to the appropriation the more the overhead charges will be, the more linen-collared, swallowtail-coat inspectors we will employ, wearing patent-leather shoes, who never get to the farms at all.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield. I contend that the farmers throughout the country are not being benefited at all by these appropriations, and they themselves realize it.

Mr. KEARNS. What becomes of this 82 per cent? Where does it go?

Mr. MADDEN. It goes to the payment of these men who are riding on trains from State to State and signing the Federal pay roll at the end of every month without having accomplished any purpose whatever. That is where it goes, and the more you make the appropriation the more of these men you will employ. Why, nobody who was in his senses would presume to say that these men have anything to do with increasing the crops. This appropriation is not intended for that purpose. It is intended to enumerate what crops are being raised. Is not that what it is for? But even that work is not done by these men except to the extent of 18 per cent, and these men who get the 18 per cent are employed by the counties. The iniquity of the whole thing lies in this, that every time you employ one of these men as a Government agent you force the county to employ another. Is not that true? Because the county can not participate in the money to be expended out of the Federal Treasury unless they, the people of the county, contribute a like amount. Now, nobody will deny that.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Is not that a very wise thing to do?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I think it would be wise to the extent that reason would justify it. But it can not be said to be wise when you run wild and exercise no reason. And I undertake to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that this $500,000 added to the bill by the Agricultural Committee is just that much waste. [Applause.] And if you add $500,000 more, it would still be that much more waste; and if you take $500,000 off, in addition to the $500,000 proposed to be taken off by the amendment of the gentleman from New York, you would make the service more efficient and your action would meet the approval of every legitimate farmer in the United States. [Applause.]

The farmers throughout the country are writing to me every day and telling me how they object to this service. A gentleman laughs. He laughs because he thinks I come from a city district. But I reckon I have just as much experience and knowledge about the agricultural regions of the United States as these men who live at crossroad corners, for I happen to be a farmer myself. And I have never seen any of these demonstrators anywhere. They pretend to say that they teach the women on the farm to make cottage cheese. My mother made cottage cheese when I was a suckling. Any woman in the United States who is a real woman knows how to make cottage cheese, and they do not have to have demonstrators from the Agricultural Department to teach them how to do that. We have it on the table every day, even here.

And then you pretend to say that unless you appropriate millions to be thrown away the farms of the United States will deteriorate.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman does not want to leave that impression?

Mr. MADDEN. Those people do not do any farming, except that they farm the Treasury of the United States; they farm that religiously and continuously. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not.

Mr. PURNELL. You do not want to leave the impression here that this money is all spent to teach the women how to make cottage cheese? That is no part of it at all. That is one of the iniquities.

Mr. MADDEN. That is one of the features of this bill.

Mr. PURNELL. I ask the gentleman to mention one of the good features of this bill, not the iniquities of it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] the other day said, "We appropriate only $30,000,000 for the farms. What difference does it make whether it is $100,000,000 or $30,000,000?" Do you mean to say that because the appropriation does not exceed more than $30,000,000 that is an excuse for appropriating more?

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman knows I wanted to get the seeds cut out of the bill, and I am in earnest about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I am not finding fault with the gentleman. He is a splendid legislator; he has done excellent work here. I commend him to his constituents; he deserves their confidence. His intelligence and industry, to say nothing of his patriotic fervor, make him one of the best men in the Congress. I am always interested in what he has to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Three minutes is a very short time in which to answer the arguments of these agriculturists from the city of New York and the city of Chicago. [Laughter.] If it were the erection of a public building in Chicago that was in issue here, where perhaps a site would cost $10,000,000, the gentleman from Illinois would make a different character of speech.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. The postal revenues show a million dollars surplus every year from the Chicago post office.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be protected from my farmer friend from Chicago. [Laughter.] If it were to promote some military autocrat in rank and pay the gentleman from Illinois would make a different kind of speech. But when it comes to aid in the greatest industry in this Nation, the one that has made this Nation great and strong and proud—the agricultural interests of the country—the gentleman inveighs against it, as he always does. I say that I join hands with the Republican Party on the question of economy, and especially its leader, who from time to time preaches economy here, but I will never follow that gentleman or any other gentleman who seeks to economize solely by taking away from the great agricultural interests of our country necessary appropriations which in past years have been given to them.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not the gentleman cut out the word "solely"?

Mr. RUCKER. No; I will leave that word in. The gentleman wants it cut out, but I will not consent because I know he is always wrong when it comes to the discussion of matters pertaining to agriculture. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, if there is any one appropriation that Congress has ever made that is justified, it is this appropriation. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] talks about the burden which it places on the counties. That is true. In the county in which I happen to live, let me say to the gentleman, 150 men, farmers, bound themselves in a written contract to employ a great leader in agricultural pursuits at $5,600 a year salary for a term of three years, and if I would not be placing myself in the same category with the gentleman from Chicago, I would say that I am one of those "farmers" that helps pay the bill. And let me say that since that time we have had great corn shows in our county, with exhibits from the gentleman's own State, from producers of corn; and from the State of Indiana, and from the State of Ohio, and from the State of Iowa, and West Virginia, farmers everywhere have brought samples of their crops there, and I witnessed a sale of corn produced in Indiana at $355 cash paid down for 100 ears of corn. I saw ears of corn from Illinois sold at the rate of more than $15 an ear.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not mean to say that these men have raised the corn?

Mr. RUCKER. No; the corn was raised by the exhibitors. It is the same all over the land, and I would be glad to see this item increased to $2,000,000 instead of being reduced to $1,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's reference to me I only want to say that I do not come from the city of New York, but that I represent a purely agricultural district in the northern part of the State of New York. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I represent as many farmers and stockmen as any man in this House and I never leave a stone unturned to advance their interests, but I want to say that there is more money wasted annually by Congress in the name of farmers and agriculture than under any other head of camouflage in which Congress so often indulges. We appropriate thousands and hundreds of thousands for this and that private enterprise and ease our consciences with simulated make-believe that it is to help agriculture and the farmer. Such rot! Such camouflage! Such poppy-cock! The intelligent farmers and stockmen have become disgusted with such shams.

We carry in this Agricultural bill $30,540,000 in the name of agriculture, and agriculture gets very little of it. Why, if the farmers and stockmen of the country got 100 per cent value out of the money authorized to be spent in this bill I would vote to double or treble it; but most of this money is wasted in keeping a lot of useless parasites on the Government pay roll and in pork-barrel leakages until the stockman and the farmer do not reap the value. I will tell you what the farmers want. All on earth they want is to be protected from the profiteers and the six-hour-workday, high-salaried, autocratic, striking Bolsheviks, who want farmers' products for nothing, and with this protection given them they want us to let them alone. I will tell you why you hear so much about the "away-from-the-farm movement." It is because, while we have been appropriating annually $30,000,000 in the name of agriculture, we have been messing with this and messing with that until we have permitted everything that the farmer uses on the farm to go up to the very highest maximum top notch, and everything the farmer and his family wears has gone up to the highest maximum top notch, while everything the farmer produces on the farm the six-hour-workday, autocratic, striking consumers are always trying to push right down to the lowest minimum possible. The farmer is the only man in the United States who labors the maximum number of hours possible every day under scorching suns and freezing blasts, day and night. The farmer now is the only man in the universe who produces to the highest maximum. Some of these farm agents and demonstrators are experts, are highly intelligent, and well informed, and are conscientious employees of this Government, desirous of benefiting the farmers and stock raisers, and do benefit them; while on the other hand hundreds of them are ignorant, lazy, shiftless, worthless cusses, who were never able to hold any position of importance before they secured this easy berth with the Government, and all on earth they care about is to draw their salary and just as large a traveling and expense account as they can conjure up, with no service of any value rendered. My intelligent farmers have already forgotten more about farming than these fellows will ever know. [Applause.] You know it as well as I do. I am getting letters every day from our farmers saying, "Please protect us from these parasites traveling over the country." The Government agent in Lampasas County, Tex., tried to lead the farmers and stockmen of that great agricultural and stock-raising county to believe during the war that the Government was trying to impose on them by price fixing, and so forth, and that he was the only protection they had from their Government. And there was not a farmer in Lampasas County who did not know more about farming than this county agent, who was a third-class land agent when he entered the Government employ.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry I can not yield to the gentleman from Indiana, but I have too little time, and he can use his own time. We are not fooling the farmers. They are the best-posted men in the United States to-day, and they know how little they get out of this $30,000,000 this Committee on Agriculture and the Congress appropriate each year for the Agriculture Department. They know how much of it is wasted and thrown away. They know that it comes out of their pockets and that they have to pay for all of it in taxes. They are tax-burdened now, and they are getting tired of it.

If you will put this $30,000,000 back into the Treasury and then pass a few wholesome laws that will require the consumers of the country to go back to work, to work at least eight hours per day, to be paid only according to their individual efficiency and production and not according to autocratic union scale, regardless of efficiency and regardless of production, and force them to settle all industrial disputes not by destructive strikes whose burdens are borne most heavily by the farmers, but by fair and just arbitration, you will then protect the farmers and stockmen from the profiteers and the conscienceless middlemen and Wall Street gamblers, then you will have rendered a real service of some value to the farmers and stockmen of this country, and then you may have some foundation for saying that you are the "farmers' friend."

I will guarantee that if any of you will take this bill to a farmer or a cattleman and let him go over it carefully and understand just exactly how and in what manner this $30,540,000 is expended you will lose his vote in the next election just as sure as he goes to the polls. I do not believe that there is a single intelligent farmer or cattleman in the United States who will approve of this $30,540,000 bill. Send them a copy and let them have time to study it before election, and then see whether or not you get their votes.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I have only four minutes.

Mr. PURNELL. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, do not take this out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PURNELL. I want to know if the gentleman has had any letters from his people——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman would just go to the farmers of the country and ask them whether or not they want this Congress to appropriate $30,540,000 in the name of agriculture and then waste it, as this bill provides, the gentleman would hear the biggest protest he ever heard in all his life. He would hear so much of a protest that, besides trying to get this garden seed monkey business stopped, he would try to get some of the other monkey business out of this bill. What are you going to do? Are you going to help the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who represents a farmers' district? Are you going to help us save the farmer from his so-called friends who want to spend $30,540,000 of his money and then raise his taxes to keep these Government employees on the pay roll? We are facing a $3,000,000,000 deficit. What do good business men do under such circumstances? Do they not retrench? Do they not economize? Do they not stop making unnecessary expenditures? Do they not use a little common sense, a little west Texas horse sense, if you please, in trying to get out of debt? Not a farmer wants his taxes raised. Every farmer wants his taxes lowered. Every farmer wants his Government to be able to pay its honest debts without issuing any more bonds for his posterity to pay. What are you going to do about it? It is all with my Republican friends on the other side, as they are in the saddle, and legislation now is just what they determine. You are responsible to the people. They are going to hold you to strict accountability.

Mr. PURNELL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas says all his farmers ask is to be let alone. When Jenner discovered vaccination as a preventive of smallpox some people of that day said the same thing. They said, "We don't want it. Let us alone." [Applause.] When I was a boy the agricultural college was a joke. Now the classical college has come very near being a joke. The agricultural colleges are rapidly surpassing the rest of these institutions because they are practical. They join with the mechanical colleges to teach men something useful, and they carry with that an education just as good as the classical education.

The gentleman suggests a touch of humor when he talks about farmers with patent-leather shoes. He does not seem to see any reason why a farmer should wear patent-leather shoes. I do not see any reason why he should not. I am in favor of patent-leather shoes for farmers. [Applause.] Whenever the young men on the farms in this country can wear patent-leather shoes and do wear them, and when they enjoy the other advantages and privileges that come to the young men in the city, we will not have to be hollering "Back to the farm." They will be there and stay there. [Applause.]

This proposition that we are endeavoring to retain in this bill is an effort to get the young men and women of this country to learn the very best of all that the ages have accumulated in the way of information for the farmers; and if there are any anywhere who do not want it they are the very people who ought to have it. [Applause and laughter.] Of course there are mistakes made in the beginning of all things new. We expect that. I have seen men come in here and urge upon this Congress what was equivalent to an appropriation for $4,000,000,000 to pay unliquidated damage claims of men who had no claims except that they violated the law and would be in the penitentiary if they had what the law accorded them. Yet here they are awfully anxious to save money. How much? How much of the $4,000,000,000?

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said a minute ago that there is more money wasted in the name of the farmer than in any other way. Why, last year this Government spent $876,000,000 to maintain an army in time of profound peace, when we did not have an enemy in the world strong enough to gasp for breath, let alone to stand up and fight. If we would put $876,000,000 behind the farmers and good roads and the development of America and its industrial soldiers, we would get the money back many times over.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. They built a lot of airships, did they not?

Mr. LITTLE. They spent $600,000,000 on that, and did not get any airships; and the very men who criminally wasted all that good money pose before the committees as "experts" and clamor for millions more to follow in Germany's path.

Mr. HICKS. They spent $1,200,000,000 all told for that.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; and what has occurred since that should encourage us to let them play with billions again. We wasted $400,000,000 last year to build battleships at $20,000,000 apiece, big iron pots that a $500,000 submarine can sink in two minutes, and would chase a battleship off the ocean any time it appeared. That money in submarines and destroyers would have put us in absolute control of the seven seas and made our coast invincible to the navies of the world. Yet they tell us we waste money in giving $30,000,000 to develop and improve the business of the backbone of the country. There is not a nickel better expended than in this appropriation right here. [Applause.] This money may do as much good in this country as any $500,000 that we will appropriate during this Congress, and it ought to stay in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the appropriation for cooperative agricultural extension work is to facilitate the distribution of information among the farmers. The contention made when this first appropriation was provided was that there was a great deal of knowledge bottled up in the department which should be distributed among the people. The county agents were suggested and legislation authorizing their employment enacted. I rise now simply to explain where this money goes. Many seem to believe that these expenditures are chiefly made for the employment of county agents. You have been told repeatedly that 75 per cent of the expenditures go to pay county agents. The facts are, according to the allotment made for the current year, that only $2,571,479 of the Federal funds, an average of $1,285 for each of the 2,000 counties, go to pay county agents, which amount is equivalent to 18 per cent of the total expenditure of $14,253,944 from Federal, State, and other sources.

I will insert statements showing the allotment of the funds.

Statement showing the Federal appropriations for extension work, also funds required to be offset by States, for the fiscal year 1921.

Federal funds:
Smith-Lever Act ($500,000 increase over fiscal year 1920)	$3,580,000
Appropriation carried in Agricultural act to supplement Smith-Lever funds	1,500,000
Farmers' cooperative demonstration work (Agricultural act) outside of the cotton belt and in the South	1,350,520
Offset required of States	4,600,000
Total	11,030,520

According to tables furnished by the department, allotments of Federal extension funds by lines of work, 1919–20, are as follows:

County agents.	Federal.	State.
Farmers' cooperative	$590,462
Reg. Fed. S. & L. act	1,079,785	$1,041,566
Supplementary	901,232	1,064,943
Miscellaneous		2,751,608
Total	2,571,479	4,858,117

Average for 2,000 counties, $1,285, or 18 per cent of total expenditures, $14,253,944.

Home demonstration.	Federal.	State.
Farmers' cooperative	$279,918
Reg. Federal	521,024	$444,413
Supplementary	341,714	288,393
Miscellaneous		696,263
Total	1,142,656	1,429,069

Average for 2,000 counties, $571, or 8 per cent of total of $14,253,944.

Club work.	Federal.	State.
Farmers' cooperative	$130,844
Reg. Federal	186,774	$153,147
Supplementary	121,682	34,955
Miscellaneous		232,222
Total	439,300	420,324

Average for 2,000 counties, $219, or 3 per cent of total expenditures, $14,235,944.

Notwithstanding the $500,000 increase carried in the permanent annual appropriation, it is proposed to appropriate the same amount carried for the current year, which increases the amount available for next year $500,000, or an average for 2,000 counties of $250. Eighteen per cent of $250 equals $45 to each of the 2,000 counties.

As I have stated, there has been much misunderstanding concerning the allotment of the Federal funds appropriated for agricultural extension and demonstration work. Representatives of farm bureaus, farmers, and State agricultural colleges all contend that the money allotted for county agents is inadequate. All seem to be in the dark as to how much of the money appropriated is expended. Their contention was, when they appeared before the committee, that the department has too many specialists living in high-priced hotels and traveling at Government expense.

As has been stated, the representatives of the farmers called the committee's attention to three specialists who, according to these representatives, reported to the State station at Lexington, Ky., representing themselves to be experts on stem rust and stem blight and requested that they be furnished transportation and assistance to investigate the stem rust and stem blight at a place near the station. The request was granted. According to their statement five days later three more specialists, sent out from Washington, reported at this same station for the purpose of studying the stem rust and blight and requested State aid. As the State funds were limited their request was turned down, and, according to the statement, nine days later three more specialists reported for the same purpose and requested aid from the State. Their request was also turned down.

We were also told that a specialist was sent to Indiana to give advice on alfalfa. He advised planting alfalfa. Much of the land in Indiana is low, without drainage, and part of it is under water. The farmers acted upon his advice and planted alfalfa. First the snow came, then it grew warm, and then cold again. As a result, first the snow melted, then it froze, and the ice killed the alfalfa. The contention is that if advice is to be given, it should be given by experts, but by those having knowledge of local conditions.

The attention of the committee was called by these representatives of farmers to specialists on black rust. The committee was told that the agent at Cerro Gordo County, Iowa, reported a few barberry bushes in the county. Immediately seven specialists appeared. They looked at the barberry bushes but left without suggestions and without disturbing the barberry bushes. Some members of the committee took exception to the statement. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] wired the county agent for information. His answer was that at least seven men came to look at the barberry bushes and that they left without offering suggestions and without destroying the barberry bushes. The county agent did not state that they came from Washington, but that, of course, is immaterial, as is the question whether they were paid directly from Federal funds or paid in part by State funds. These are a few of the apparent waste expenditures pointed out by the representatives of the farm organizations.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Did not that same bunch of gentlemen that the chairman is now quoting ask our committee to appropriate, instead of $1,500,000 for this item, $3,000,000 for the item, and is not that the campaign they are making?

Mr. HAUGEN. They want all the money they can get, but they want it for county agents. They are not asking for additional funds for specialists. What the farmer wants is somebody who will come to the farm to enlighten him. These county agents are doing excellent work and their work meets with general approval.

In this connection it is well to bear in mind that large sums of money are expended for specialists by other bureaus of the department. Practically every bureau sends out its specialists. Take, for instance, the Bureau of Animal Industry. If you will turn to page 131 of the hearings on the Bureau of Animal Industry you will find that Mr. Rommel, in reply to a question as to how his bureau cooperated with the States Relations Service, stated:

> In the organization of pig clubs, in the beef-cattle demonstration work in the South, in the farm sheep demonstration work, and in the poultry club work. Our work in the organization of pig clubs is gradually becoming work in swine husbandry. We cooperate with the States Relations Service in this way: We have our men who devote their entire time to the extension work. They are stationed in the Animal Husbandry Division and work through the States Relations Service, and through them with the agricultural colleges.

As to the number of men in that work, Mr. Rommel stated that there were probably 50 or 60 altogether. On pages 137 and 138 you will find the list giving the names and salaries of each of the 60.

On page 139 Mr. Rommel, in reference to the character of the work done in dry farming, states:

> My suggestion is that they start with a little bunch of cows that they can milk, so that they can have milk and butter, and cheese, possibly; that they have a little flock of chickens; that they try to get off of the farm enough to keep the family alive.

It would seem that the county agents could give the advice in the matters indicated in Mr. Rommel's statement, and that there is no particular need for specialists to travel from Washington to the far West to suggest that the farmers out there start with a "little bunch of cows that they can milk" or a little flock of chickens.

If you will turn to page 112, you will find that Dr. Mohler, chief of the bureau, in connection with the tick eradication, states: "The salaries and traveling expenses of 280 men, working in nine States, are paid out of Federal funds." Besides, a number are sent out by the Dairy Division to organize bull clubs, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has stated, to teach the farmer's wife how to make cottage cheese. In this connection, for the hog-cholera work, besides the $29,000 for research work and $188,000 for inspection service in regulating the preparation, sale, barter, and exchange or shipment of virus serum toxin or amalgamous products manufactured in the United States which guarantees a potent serum to the user thereof, the bill now carries about $200,000 for salaries and traveling expenses for specialists to travel over the country and teach the farmers what they already know about hog-cholera serum.

What is true of the Bureau of Animal Industry is true of many other bureaus. Much of the work, yes, practically all of it, is good work, and by all means the good work should be continued, but we apparently are short on cash and top-heavy on specialists; much of the work can and should be done by county agents, as was intended when the service was inaugurated; besides with 4¼ per cent Government bonds selling around 90 cents and with another bond issue staring us in the face, it goes without saying that expenditures must be cut. If not, more money must be raised either by taxes or by the issuing of bonds.

The committee was advised by nearly every bureau chief that specialists are leaving the department and that the vacancies can not be filled at the salaries offered. The question was asked that if the services of the specialists can not be had why should the appropriations for them be continued?

Much has been said about the farmers and representatives of farmers wearing patent-leather shoes. It is true that representatives of farmers appeared before the committee. No particular attention was paid to their shoes, but attention was paid to their suggestions. Their suggestions were that the appropriation for specialists be cut and more money be appropriated for the salary and expenses of county agents. [Applause.]

Representatives of State colleges also appeared. If you will turn to page 136 of the hearings on the States Relations Service you will find that Dr. Russell, dean of the College of Agriculture, University of Wisconsin, had this to say:

Dr. RUSSELL. Generally speaking, we do not need an expert from Washington if we have a field that is already covered by a man on the ground, because he is more familiar with the local conditions than a Washington man can be. We are making more and more cooperative arrangements with the Washington men in connection with certain lines of work which we do not have in our college, whereby the men are paid partly by Federal money and partly by State money and are located at the college, carrying out this work cooperatively between the two. Take, for instance, bees, on which we have a man now. Washington paying three-fourths of the expenses and we one-fourth. We would not be able to carry on this work if it were not for this cooperation with Secretary Houston.

The CHAIRMAN. You match the money we appropriate with the local funds, doubling the amount, which makes available, on an average, more than $4,500 for each county.

Dr. RUSSELL. The State pays half of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood you to say that you paid only $1,800 into the county. What becomes of the other $2,700?

Dr. RUSSELL. That I can not answer.

Dr. RUSSELL. We have $80,000 in the State of Wisconsin, and we have 71 counties. Fifty of those counties have county agents.

It would seem that if the appropriation for cooperative agricultural extension work is to be increased $500,000 for next year, we should provide that more of the money should be used for county agents and less for specialists. If so, undoubtedly many more counties would avail themselves of the service. It is a regrettable fact that many people do not take more kindly to the service, as, for instance, in the State of Wisconsin only 50 out of 71 counties have county agents. If you will turn to page 16 of the hearings on the States Relations Service, you will find that the number of cooperative extension employees in the States dropped from 3,001 in July, 1918, to 2,774 in January, 1919, and to 2,501 in October, 1919; that the number of county agricultural agents dropped to 1,999 in December, 1919; and that the number of counties without county agricultural agents is 937; and, further, that the number without home demonstration agents is 2,123.

Mr. Smith, of the Bureau of States Relations Service, in the hearings, stated: "The loss in home demonstration work through the year has been 55 per cent." When asked the reason for this loss, his answer was: "They were dropped because there was no local financial cooperation. They were largely paid from Federal and State sources." When Mr. Merritt was asked if all States had come under the law, his answer, on page 66 of the hearings on the States Relations Service, was: "All of them are receiving the full amount under the Smith-Lever Act, except one State, which has not been able to meet the supplementary fund; that is Pennsylvania."

That, together with the statement of Dr. Russell and representatives of the farmers, shows that there is something wrong in the allotment of funds. All concede that the work done by the county agents, home demonstration, and the boys' and girls' club is most excellent work and should be encouraged. I take it that no one will contend that by simply increasing the sum $500,000, which would add $45 a county for the county agent, will materially encourage the good work. No; if anything is to be done to encourage the work, provisions directing the proper allotment of funds for county agents should be made. If so, there will be no need of increased appropriations; to the contrary, they can be safely reduced. If you desire to help the farmer and the farmer's wife, do the practical thing, provide for men and women to assist them in their work—not the specialists traveling about at great expense, but the county agent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why does not the committee, if they think this ought to be corrected, put a provision in the bill as to what proportion shall be spent?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will offer such an amendment to the paragraph after the pending amendment has been disposed of.

One has said, Increase the appropriation and thus increase production. If the purpose is to increase production, give the surplus and inefficient specialist a job on the farm instead of in Washington. Give him a ride on the gang plow instead of in an automobile. He will undoubtedly produce more corn riding a corn plow than he will in riding in a Ford, demonstrating what every farmer knows, such things as the use of hog-cholera serum, the making of cottage cheese, the organization of bull clubs, or the organization of cooperative associations. County agents are capable and ready to do that, and by all means should be permitted to do so.

In my opinion, instead of cutting the appropriation for the extermination of the corn borer down to $300,000, and that in the face of the estimates made by the department and State entomologists, we had better cut appropriations for other lines of activity and thus reserve an adequate sum to meet the ravages of the most dangerous pest known to foodstuffs. I fancy that the corn producers of the country have more interest in the destruction of the injurious pest—the corn borer—than they have in the specialists, even though their services are desirable. Here is what the department and entomologists have to say about the corn borer.

The note in the Book of Estimates reads:

The estimate for the control of the European corn borer has been omitted. On July 29, 1919, the department recommended to the Congress, in the form of a supplemental estimate, that the sum of $500,000, in addition to the appropriation of $250,000 carried in the appropriation act for 1920, be included in the first deficiency bill and be made available immediately in order that the campaign against the corn borer might be more effectively prosecuted.

I also quote from the report of the committee on policy, adopted by the American Association of Economic Entomologists at St. Louis, Mo., January 1, 1920. It reads:

The committee favors an energetic effort by the General Government to control and, if possible, eradicate.

Another quotation reads:

Furthermore, we recommend a Federal quarantine, restricted as to area.

And here is what the association recommends as to the $500,000 deficit:

It is further recommended that the Secretary of Agriculture be asked to reconsider the situation in view of the materially changed conditions resulting from investigations of the last few months, and that he be urged to request of Congress a special appropriation of $750,000 to be immediately available for cleaning up the infested territories in the early spring, along lines substantially as outlined above.

Geo. A. Dean, entomologist, Kansas Experiment Station; A. G. Ruggles, State entomologist, Minnesota; R. W. Harned, entomologist, Mississippi; G. M. Bentley, Knoxville, Tenn.; W. E. Rumsey, Morgantown, W. Va.; E. D. Ball, Ames, Iowa; L. Haseman, entomologist, Columbia, Mo.; Stephen A. Forbes, chief Natural History Survey of Illinois; Myron H. Swenk, State entomologist, Nebraska; S. B. Fracker, Madison, Wis.

The association recommends that $750,000 be made immediately available, or a total of $1,000,000 for the current year.

The amendment adopted in the House to this bill carries $300,000 for next year and not $1 for the current year, or, in other words, if the action taken by the House prevails, the corn borer is to be given the right of way from now until the 1st of July. After the 1st of July not $2,000,000, the amount estimated, but only $300,000 is to be made available for next year. As before stated, due consideration should be given to the work of eradicating the corn borer. Rather than to appropriate $300,000, an amount entirely inadequate for this work, action should be deferred until estimates can be submitted, at which time the matter can be dealt with more intelligently.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, in three minutes I can not say what I would like to say, of course. I would like to reply to the speech just made by the chairman of the committee in regard to the specialists sent out over the country. He talks about seven men going out to look at barberry bushes. That testimony was refuted by gentlemen from the Agricultural Department, who said that they do not do business that way. The men who went to look at those barberry bushes were State men and not Government men.

I want to refute another statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and also by the chairman of the committee, and that is that 80 per cent of this money is spent for overhead charges and for men running around over the country, for hotel bills, and things of that kind. I have just come from the telephone and have taken this matter up with Dr. True, who has charge of the work. I did not want to depend upon my own memory. He states that this $1,500,000, practically every cent of it, is going to pay men who are employed as agents in the various counties, and that not 5 per cent of it will ever be used for anything else except to pay the salaries of the farm demonstrators. That ought to be a complete refutation of the statement that 80 per cent of the money is going into overhead charges and that a large part of it is going to pay specialists who travel around over the country.

The Smith-Lever bill, which we passed a number of years ago and which appropriates for farm demonstration work all over the country, contains in it a provision of law specifying how much money can be used for overhead charges and things of that sort, and all overhead charges will be paid out of the money appropriated under that act. Of the $1,500,000 we are appropriating here every cent of it is going to pay the salaries of the men and women who are employed to do farm demonstration work. I want the million and a half dollars appropriated in this bill, and I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to cut it down $500,000. Let us continue the work and extend it into the four or five hundred other counties where they have not had farm demonstration. Let us appropriate this entire sum and provide for these farm agents and let them go ahead with this great work. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the State of Iowa has thought enough of the farm-agent movement to authorize every county board of supervisors to cooperate in the county-agent movement by the appropriation of money in order to carry on the work under the provisions of law. The time has disappeared when the farmer says that he does not want the county agents to come around and assist him in improving his farm work. As a matter of fact, he is welcome on their farms. He has helped them in orchard work, he has helped them in stock problems, he has helped them in seed corn, he has helped them in the oats problem, he has helped them in a great many problems in every way. I believe we ought to do all we can in this county-agent work, and if the money is not spent in the right place, add a proviso saying that it shall go for the purposes which the gentleman from Missouri says it does go. [Applause.]

Complaint has been made before the committee that about 80 per cent of the money so appropriated is used for administrative work and only about 20 per cent of it actually goes to the paying of the expense, salary, and so forth, of the county agent. It appears to me to be an easy matter to attach to this bill a proviso that at least $1,200,000 of the appropriation of $1,500,000 should go toward paying the salary and actual expenses of the county agents employed.

In view of the increased demand for food production, it would seem to me a gross mistake to reduce this appropriation to $1,000,000, as suggested by the gentleman from New York. The county agent is surely an instrument to encourage the increase of farm production of all kinds. He has made a careful study of these problems; he assists the farmer in working out his problems in the most effective way; he encourages attention to good seed; he encourages attention to live-stock production; he gives instructions as to how to preserve soil fertility. In the State of Iowa the movement has been indorsed to such an extent that we have a county agent in every county in the State. We have the State chairman of the National Federation of Farm Bureaus, and we want to give every encouragement to this work that we possibly can.

I trust that it will be the voice of this committee that the amendment of the gentleman from New York to reduce this appropriation will not prevail.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of continuing the work carried on by the county agents. I was to a certain extent responsible for the employment of the first county agents that were employed in my State.

I have always favored the work, but, without regard to the character of any work, there is a limit beyond which we are not justified in using the Nation's money to carry it on. There is a point where it ceases to be worthy and helpful, and we have already reached that point with regard to this work. If the appropriation is reduced by the amount suggested, there would still be approximately $5,000,000 left with which to employ farm agents if it were used for that purpose. I am beginning to get letters from farmers whom I have encouraged to contribute to the employment of farm agents, saying, "For Heaven's sake, save us from the overimportuning of men who are going around asking us, after we have hired one agent and paid half his salary, to hire another one; we do not need the second man any more than we need a fifth wheel to our wagons." [Applause.]

Gentlemen, you can not fool the farmer; and men who imagine that they can fool the farmer into believing they are his especial friends by constantly increasing appropriations for the purpose of hiring more people to take them out of the ranks of the producer and put them into the ranks of the consumer will have a rude awakening some day when they come in contact with the votes of the farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, we are all in favor of economy, but that economy should not be directed toward an essential of a great industry, such as agriculture. I have the honor to represent, in part, the great city of New York, although a great part of my district lies outside in the agricultural section of Long Island. I have in two counties of that district two farm bureaus, and they are doing splendid work; and they ought to be commended for the results accomplished. I believe their work should be fostered and continued, and, therefore, on behalf of the farmers of the city of New York I am in favor of the provisions of this bill and opposed to the amendment offered by my colleague from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation in the current law for this work is $1,500,000 for the fiscal year 1920. The amount proposed in this bill is simply a continuance of the same amount for 1921. It comes to you recommended by the Committee on Agriculture. The full committee recommends it, and therefore it has their indorsement as presented to you in the pending bill.

There is continual criticism about the expenditure of money for agricultural work which is very beneficial and for which provision is made in this bill. Is there any genuine economy in curtailing work for which you have already expended money, which has been begun and is proving successful, and which is bringing the splendid results that this work is producing? Is there any economy in reducing the appropriations and injuring the work already begun? That is certainly a false idea of economy. During the war, when there was an effort made to increase production in the United States, the appeal was made through this very work, and why? Because it reached every neighborhood, every community, went into every corner of the United States, and the people engaged in this work promptly and patriotically responded to the request made on them for increased production, with the result that there was over a billion dollars increased production in the United States to meet the demands at that time which were urgent not only here but abroad. It is easy for a Member like the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MADDEN], by assertion not backed up by facts or actual knowledge of conditions, to assail an appropriation of this kind and assert that 82 per cent of it is going to overhead charges, to people riding up and down the country on trains and paying out money of the Government in hotel bills and things of that kind. It was shown conclusively by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] that the assertion of the gentleman from Chicago is unfounded, because from facts obtained from the department, from those who know the facts, the gentleman from Missouri demonstrated that the money largely goes into the local communities for the direct benefit of the people on the farms, and therefore the people are enjoying the good results that are apparent and can not be successfully controverted or disproved.

I was surprised at the meandering position of our chairman [Mr. HAUGEN]. He criticizes the continuance of the work provided for in this appropriation and by his criticisms backs up to a certain extent the gentleman from Chicago, and in that way opposes this provision of his own bill; but as usual, in the conclusion of his speech, he says that it is a good work and it ought to be encouraged. He furnishes the facts to criticize and condemn it and then approves it. Let us take his advice in the conclusion of his speech and encourage this work by maintaining this appropriation in the bill and by voting down the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this amendment be permitted to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time, eight and a half minutes, to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, while I have the matter in mind I wish to correct the statement which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] made, inadvertently, of course, that if the amount carried in the bill remains the amount available from all sources for extension work for next year will be the same as this year. The correct statement is that the entire amount available will be $500,000 more than during this year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I speak as a friend of extension work. I heartily approve a system of county agents. At least 10 years ago I offered what I believe was the first amendment offered in this House to increase the appropriation available for that kind of work, for an increase, which was adopted, of about $65,000, added to a meager appropriation of about $180,000. A year or so later I introduced, at the request of the executive committee of the Association of Agricultural Colleges, a bill the substance of which afterwards became a law, now known as the Lever Act for agricultural extension work. The executive committee knew my hearty approval of that kind of work, and, having prepared the bill, they asked me to introduce it, and I did so. The Committee on Agriculture at that time was opposed to it, was not ready for it, so I was unable to get anywhere with it. The next year Mr. Lever, then one of the majority of the committee, introduced a similar bill, and it became a law. I have from the beginning been in favor of expenditure of money for extension work, and I will say to the gentlemen of the House that where the work is well done it is very, very helpful, indeed, to the farmer, and abundant return follows the expenditure of the money.

So that you may have some idea of how this work started and how it has been carried on, as indicated by the amount of money appropriated and as showing the attitude of the Congress, let me give you some figures:

Ten years ago there was appropriated for this work in the cotton States $250,155. The bill now before you carries for the same work in the same sections of the country $645,040. Ten years ago for this work in the North $130,000 was appropriated. This year the bill carries for special work in the North, the same work exactly, $751,000. In addition to these special sums to supplement both of these appropriations there is still another special appropriation available this year, $1,500,000, and the total of these three special appropriations is $2,896,320. In addition to these special sums, aggregating, as I say, nearly $3,000,000, there is available this year $3,080,000 from the Lever Act; that is, there is a total of $5,976,320 for lines of activities for which 10 years ago only $380,000 was appropriated, an immense and rapid increase, you must admit, and indicating a very favorable disposition toward the work on the part of the Committee on Agriculture and very favorable action by the Congress.

Now, what is the reason of this strenuous demand on the part of the Department of Agriculture for continuing, even for increasing, this already very large sum of money? When the war opened it was insisted to us that large money was necessary for the purpose of stimulating agriculture, increasing production, and preventing waste. And a special bill, as you will remember, was passed, carrying a special appropriation of $6,100,000 for this work; that is, in addition to all other appropriations which then carried about $5,000,000. Being much interested in this work, I frequently spoke at one time and another to men in the Agricultural Department respecting it. I often asked them, "How are you getting along with the extension work?" Their reply was, "We are going on with it and expanding it just as rapidly as we can possibly find suitable men. It is very difficult to find suitable men; we are having difficulty in finding them, so that the work may be carried on in a satisfactory manner; we are doing all we can and as fast as we can." But what did they do? When this $6,100,000 of war money was appropriated they went out and picked up a great force overnight, as it were, attached them to the pay roll, and when the war closed officials came to the Committee on Agriculture, and later some others, in and out of the department, who are more influenced than I am by their insistent demands, came to Congress and insisted that all or a very large part of that extra $6,100,000 should be continued and made a permanent fund, to be added to the already large and rapidly growing regular and special appropriations, so that this mushroom growth of the extension agents might not be separated from the public crib.

Now, I have nothing but commendation for this extension work when it is properly done, but during the war they attached thousands of men to this roll that were not competent, and out of that has grown contempt for this service on the part of many of the farmers of the country. Why, we had men, many of them in the service, some outside the service, and this same bureau came to our committee asking for the employment of "experts" to advise, bolster up, and help the poor county agents. We said, "Why, the work proposed to be done by specialists and assistants of all kinds is directly in line with the work of the county agents." "But," they said, "the county agents are not competent. We must employ and send men out to help them; we have to have specialists for cattle, specialists in cattle diseases, specialists in hog diseases, specialists in poultry, and specialists in different kinds of farm crops." We were told by innumerable witnesses before our committee, by many who are themselves employed in the department, that "specialists" must go to the assistance of inexperienced and incompetent agents. The hearings are filled with such statements.

Now, the subcommittee recommended only $1,000,000 for this item, sincerely believing that will be enough to maintain the work on its present basis, and if that amount is agreed to the total available for the coming year will be exactly the same as for this year, because the Lever Act will supply $500,000 more than this year. Inefficient as it is, of mushroom growth as it is, the amount proposed by the subcommittee and available altogether will enable the department to continue the work on its present basis. They wish $1,500,000, which will be an increase over the present sum available of $500,000, as I have stated. I think that extra amount ought not to be allowed, and therefore I believe the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], decreasing this item from $1,500,000 to $1,000,000, ought to be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I would like to have read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 74, line 13, after the words "May 8, 1914," insert "Provided, That not less than $1,200,000 of the above appropriation shall be expended for salaries of county agents."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. It is a change of existing law.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asks to have the amendment read for information. It should not be offered, at least, until after the pending amendment is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be offered after the disposition of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNELL: Page 74, line 8, strike out "$1,500,000" and insert "$1,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SNELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 95.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 74, line 13, after the figures "1914," insert "Provided, That not less than $1,200,000 of the above appropriation shall be expended for salaries of county agents."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, was not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska for information merely, and therefore it is not pending?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I should like it if the point of order should be reserved instead of being made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman could not debate it anyhow. The debate is closed.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Let it go, then.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, it is simply a limitation on the appropriation. There is no question about its being in order. If you have the right to limit it, you have the right to put on a limitation.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, what is the law that is to be changed?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws the point of order, and the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the law that this would change?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This amendment, as I understand it, directs the expenditure of a certain amount of money for a certain purpose. I understand the amendment directs the Secretary to expend a certain amount of money for the pay of county agents, or for a certain purpose, instead of leaving the appropriation to be expended under the item in accordance with the discretion of the Secretary. Of course, a positive direction to expend a certain amount of money for a certain purpose is legislation.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, if this is the correct interpretation of the language, then it seems to me it is quite evident that it is in order, because it places a limitation upon the expenditure. They say that we will appropriate money and expend it, and we can not expend it in any other way except this way, which is a limitation upon the expenditure. Those limitations are always in order, and if this would be legislation then every limitation on an expenditure would be such.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be quite in order to say that not more than $1,200,000 of this sum shall be expended for this purpose. This amendment is a limitation. That is a direction or requirement.

Mr. LITTLE. Any direction is a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] offers an amendment to provide that not less than $1,200,000 of the appropriation contained in this paragraph shall be expended in salaries to county agents. The appropriation authorized in this paragraph is under the authority of a previous act, which would not appear to authorize the specific direction of the money to be appropriated for the purpose of the previous law to be applied for any particular purpose, and the Chair is of the opinion that the language of the amendment does not come within the rule relating to limitations, and sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 74, line 19, after the semicolon, insert "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated for farmers' cooperative demonstration work or cooperative agricultural extension work shall be expended unless the amount to be expended for county agents by the Federal Government is equivalent to the expenditures for this purpose from States and other sources."

Mr. HAUGEN. That provides here that at least 50 per cent of it shall be applied to county agents.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER. Was not the debate exhausted on this paragraph and all amendments thereto?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; debate was exhausted on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read again. I could not catch it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. RUBEY. That it changes existing law and provides how this money shall be expended. We passed the Lever law several years ago, and this paragraph quotes that act, and this money is appropriated to be spent in accordance with the provisions of that act; and certainly if the end sought to be obtained by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is contained in the act, then this amendment is not required; and if it is not found in that law, then this will become a change of law.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on the point of order for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is not subject to a point of order. This is a positive limitation on the amount to be expended, for this reason: Unless the State comes forward and makes an appropriation similar in amount to that provided for, the Federal Treasury will be subject to a larger charge than it would be if this amendment were in the law, and inasmuch as the amendment reduces the amount to be drawn from the Federal Treasury it is a reduction of the amount that may be expended and therefore a true limitation, in the parliamentary sense, and therefore, in my opinion, not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may have five minutes in which to explain what his amendment proposes to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the gentleman from Iowa may have five minutes to explain the purposes of the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not care for the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, as I stated a moment ago, there has been a great deal of misconception as to the allotment of these funds. What I am endeavoring to do by this amendment is to provide that the Government shall match the dollars furnished by the States and from other sources for county agents, so that whenever the State puts up one dollar for the agents, then the Federal Government shall put up an equal amount, so far as Federal funds are available. Now, the gentleman stated and believes that the Government is expending 80 per cent of the money appropriated for county agents. I have stated that the Federal Government is contributing less than half of the amount for county agents of the total amount expended from all sources, and also that less than half of the total Federal appropriation goes to county agents. I think everybody is satisfied that half of this money should be expended for county agents. If you go fifty-fifty and give half for county agents and half for specialists and other activities, there should be no objection, as no one here has suggested that more than half of it should be used for specialists and other activities.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understood the gentleman's amendment, it did not require the State to put up as much as the Federal Government does, but it only provided that the Federal Government shall put up at least as much as the States do. It does not limit the amount that the Federal Government may pay over that.

Mr. HAUGEN. No; the Federal Government can pay more, but it must pay at least 50 per cent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Federal Government now pays more than 50 per cent, does it not?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the contention of the gentleman from Missouri. My figures show that they do not. Let us make it equal. Representatives of the farmers who appeared before the committee stated that at least half should be expended for county agents.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the county wants to pay more than the amount that the Federal Government is willing to contribute, why should not the county be permitted to do so? Under the gentleman's amendment they could not, because the gentleman's amendment will not permit the State or county to pay more than half.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Therefore it is new legislation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; it is a limitation.

Mr. HAUGEN. What the representatives of the farmers desired was that at least half of this money should be expended for county agents. They are much more interested in the county agents than they are in the specialists who travel over the country and so are we. The value of the county agent is not questioned. Under the present arrangement the counties have nothing to say as to whether the money shall go for agents or for other activities, as the matter is determined by Federal and State officials.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the existing law which provides for this appropriation require the conditions set up in your amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. I stated here a moment ago that there are about 2,000 counties to which the service has been extended. Many of the counties receive only $600 from Federal funds for county agents. The average is about $1,285. It costs about $3,000 a year to maintain a county agent. More of the money that is being spent for specialists by the Government should be used for county agents. If you would divide the amount available of the total for specialists and other expenditures than for county agents by the number of counties, you would find that the amount of Federal funds used for county agents is small in comparison. The representatives of the farmers who appeared before the committee stated that they were more interested in the county agents than they were in the specialists. I am, too, and I agree with them, gentlemen. That is why I have offered this amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Was it the gentleman's purpose in offering this amendment to arrange it so that the State would give as much as the Federal Government gives, or else the Government would not spend the money?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; the Government must give as much for county agents as the States.

Mr. LITTLE. Or else the Government will not give anything, unless they give as much as we do?

Mr. HAUGEN. It would not be available unless the Federal Government gives dollar for dollar for what States give for county agents.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not understand. Does the gentleman mean that the Government money shall not be expended unless we put up as much as they do, or does he mean that the Government money shall not be expended unless they put up as much as we do?

Mr. HAUGEN. That the Federal money shall not be expended unless the Government puts up as much as is put up by the State or from other sources.

Under this bill there will be available over $6,000,000 and $3,000 on an average for a county. If a county puts up $3,000 and allots $1,500 for a county agent, the Federal Government would be required to match the $1,500, or, in other words, a large number of counties would receive $1,500 instead of the $600 which they are now receiving.

Mr. LITTLE. Or else the Federal Government can not pay anything?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is correct.

Mr. LITTLE. Do you mean that they must put up as much as we do?

Mr. HAUGEN. The Government must put up an amount equal to that put up by the States or from other sources. That is a 50-50 basis.

Mr. LITTLE. That is not what you say. You say we shall not spend any of our money unless the amount that we spend is equivalent to what they spend.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. LITTLE. If we spend $50,000 and they spend $100,000, then the money of the Federal Government can not be expended?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; it can not be expended.

Mr. LITTLE. That is what you say.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am perfectly willing to modify the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 74, line 13, after the semicolon, insert: "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated for farmers' cooperative demonstration work or cooperative agricultural extension work shall be expended unless the amount to be expended for county agents by the Federal Government is equivalent to the expenditures for this purpose from States and other sources.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to the point of order. This may or may not be a desirable amendment on its merits, but it certainly seems to me to be in order. This is not an effort to limit the discretion of any executive official. It simply provides the conditions under which this House is willing that the appropriation which it makes may be used. The Congress is not compellable to make any appropriation in this connection, or for any other lawful purpose. It can withhold an appropriation at any time that it so chooses. The effect of this amendment is simply to provide that this appropriation may not be availed of except under certain conditions which are set out in the amendment. This is a proper money limitation, and it seems to me, whatever may be said about the merits of this amendment, that as a parliamentary proposition it is in order.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to state to the chairman of the committee that I think his amendment is well meant, but I do not think he has expressed what he intended to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that he has not said what he intended to say. I suggest that he amend it by saying that the money shall not be spent unless the State puts up as much as we put up.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is practically the present policy as to the paragraph just debated.

Mr. LITTLE. I know it is.

Mr. HAUGEN. The amendment changes that.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman means that if we appropriate $50,000 and they appropriate $100,000 we can not spend our $50,000?

Mr. HAUGEN. Unless they put up an equal amount.

Mr. LITTLE. How much are we appropriating under this program now?

Mr. HAUGEN. A million and three hundred thousand dollars in the two preceding paragraphs and a million and a half in this paragraph, making nearly $3,000,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman mean to state that if they put up $4,000,000 we can not spend $3,000,000?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not at all.

Mr. LITTLE. That is what the gentleman says.

Mr. HAUGEN. The amendment has reference to the county agents. They can spend the other part as they now spend it.

Mr. LITTLE. And the gentleman means if they put up more than we do we can not spend any at all?

Mr. HAUGEN. For the county agents we propose a 50-50 basis.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, the gentleman wrote the amendment, and he can go ahead with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment that no part of the money appropriated for farm cooperative demonstration work or cooperative agricultural extension work shall be expended unless the amount to be expended for county agents by the Federal Government is equivalent to the expenditure for this purpose from State and other sources.

The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that that is a change in existing law and therefore legislation. The Chair has examined the act of May 8, 1914, which is the existing law relative to cooperative agricultural work, and finds that the purposes of this work are set forth in that statute, and provision is there made for the allotment and the spending of the appropriation to be made each year.

There is also a provision that no payments out of the additional appropriation herein provided shall be made in any year in any State until an equal sum has been appropriated by the legislature for that State.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Chair is referring to the Smith-Lever Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is referring to the act mentioned in the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. HAUGEN. A million and a half dollars is being spent as provided for in the Lever Act. I propose to change that and say how it shall be allotted.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in the gentleman's amendment to advise the Chair that it applies to any other act than that mentioned in the paragraph. The Chair is assuming that the gentleman's amendment refers to the act specified in the paragraph under consideration. The language of the amendment, as the Chair understands it, is to the effect that none of the fund mentioned shall be expended for county agents unless the amount to be expended by the Federal Government is equivalent to the expenditure for this purpose from the States or other sources.

The Chair thinks that that does not contravene the statute, which requires the State to put up an equal amount to that appropriated by the Federal Government; that it is a limitation upon the appropriation sought to be made by Congress. If the Chair may be permitted, it is not in the usual phraseology of limitations where other appropriations are required, where Federal appropriation is made dependent upon other appropriations being made from other sources, but the Chair is of the opinion that this is clearly a limitation which does not contravene the requirements of the original law, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment which will remove the objection made by the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment and offer a new amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 74, after line 13, insert: "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated for farm and cooperative demonstration work or cooperative agricultural extension work shall be expended unless the amount to be expended for county agents by the Federal Government is equivalent to the amount to be expended for other employees of the States Relations Service by the Federal Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment. It seems to me that it is subject to a point of order. The amendment says that the appropriation shall not be available, and talks about the amount paid in the various States to the State men.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, it simply provides that 50 per cent of the appropriation is to go to the county agents and the other 50 per cent to other employees of the States Relations Service.

Mr. RUBEY. It does not say that.

Mr. TINCHER. As a matter of fact, only 18 per cent of it now goes to county agents; and that is what the gentleman is trying to get away from, so as to give 50 per cent instead of 18 per cent. Is not that right?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is, of the total expenditures made.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist upon the point of order?

Mr. RUBEY. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is practically the same amendment as the other. If the other amendment is preferred, I have no objection to substituting it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the manner in which the money provided by the Lever law is to be used is determined by that law. These appropriations of $751,000 for the North and $640,000 for the South, with the $1,500,000 additional just added, are special appropriations, and the manner of the distribution of them can clearly be determined by just such a provision as the gentleman from Iowa proposes to add.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which provides that no part of the money for farmers' cooperative work or cooperative agricultural extension work shall be expended unless the amount to be expended for county agents by the Federal Government is equivalent to the amount to be expended for other employees of the States Relations Service by the Federal Government, to which the gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw this amendment and offer the amendment withdrawn a moment ago, so that the matter may be disposed of without delay. The Chair has already held the amendment in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment and reoffer the amendment previously withdrawn. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment which the gentleman now offers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 74, line 13, after the colon, insert:

"Provided, That no part of the money appropriated for farmers' cooperative demonstration work, or cooperative agricultural extension work, shall be expended unless the amount to be expended for county agents by the Federal Government is equivalent to the expenditures for this purpose from States and other sources."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute which I desire to offer for that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment to that amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 74, line 13, after the words "May 8, 1914," insert:

"Provided, That of the above appropriation not more than $300,000 shall be expended for purposes other than the salaries of county agents."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the island of Guam, and the Virgin Islands of the United States, including the erection of buildings, the preparation, illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins and all other necessary expenses, $205,000, as follows: Alaska, $75,000, of which $11,800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be immediately available for the erection of buildings, purchase of breeding live stock, and other expenses connected with the stock-breeding experiments on the island of Kodiak and at the Matanuska station; Hawaii, $50,000; Porto Rico, $50,000; Guam, $15,000; and the Virgin Islands of the United States, $15,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the island of Guam, and the Virgin Islands of the United States: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated for the experiment station in Hawaii $10,000 may be used in agricultural extension work in Hawaii.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice in the latter part of this paragraph it is provided that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to sell these products, but it does not state whether the fund shall be a revolving fund or be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Is there any general law on that subject?

Mr. HAUGEN. My understanding is that there is. I would have no objection to providing for that, but I understand it is not necessary. In order to make it a revolving fund it must say so specifically.

Mr. BLACK. In order to make sure I offer to amend, after the word "States," in line 17, page 75, by inserting "and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, line 17, after the word "States," insert: "and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for States Relations Service, $4,866,120.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, you have all been kind to me. My remarks are made with respect, even humility, with the object of cooperating with you for legislation to improve upon our present method of handling public lands in Nevada, about 100,000 square miles, administered upon plans unsuited to our needs; if not good for our section, then not good for your section, whose sole purpose is building a country of mutual interests wherein all will share alike.

The western man admires and fully supports the building instinct of eastern men. We plead earnestly and honestly, and we hope for equal confidence from yourselves, recognizing our integrity of purpose. Our business principles are sound, founded upon the eternal truth that honesty is the only policy. We strive to build the West, our chosen home. Our State administration is efficient and exemplary. Our governor a native Nevadan and statesman of highest class. Our legislature and all officials men of sterling character. Your interest in the West is mutual with ours. You desire growth; our ambition and our life work is there, to build.

The pioneers of Wyoming, with their indomitable building and reclaiming spirit, deserve all their prosperity; they did not sell their public lands, but gave them as reward to men who would brave rough weather and adverse conditions to reclaim those vast areas to grazing; finally oil was struck; now the early pioneer rightfully owns the land. The only man who was qualified to subdue the West takes certain pride in offering his bank account for any need of his beloved State. Nebraska 45 years ago was called the great American desert, but our Government's policy in giving homesteads to settlers has since made it a garden spot through their industry.

The State of Texas, rich beyond compare from her public lands, sets the proud example of modern education and advancement.

Words will not describe Oklahoma's prosperity. Tulsa's population has twice doubled in four years. Oklahoma City has 120,000 inhabitants, its population having doubled in 10 years. Fourteen years ago when Oklahoma was admitted as the forty-sixth State $5 bills looked like Government bonds.

There are no public lands left in those prosperous States. Does anyone in this House regret the prosperity of Texas? Will a Member from the Lone Star State refuse to Nevada the policy which made Texas prosper? After 56 years of statehood Nevada is still 90 per cent Government owned. One hundred thousand square miles await recognition from you of a plan inducing and rewarding the arduous toil and hardships necessary to make that soil produce. The only enemy to our mutual desire is suspicion, fostered by misguided conservation, keeping Nevada lands idle and undeveloped. When you learn, as you will eventually, that inspectors and directors, all appointees several times removed from the people's selection, lacking the knowledge and bound by departmental zeal against the only ones who can reclaim this portion of the West, when the certain courage of our pioneers is recognized, when we are trusted with our work, then the liability which you now find will be turned into an asset and you will be proud of the men who made Nevada. England is irrigating 35,000,000 acres in India and sending enormous sums of money into western Canada. Our Government sits with complacency while the lands away north of the Canadian border are securing thousands of our finest type of men, the western pioneer builder. Give them your confidence and keep them here. Without them Nevada will forever be a desert.

There during the February thaws and June freshets you have water wasted which could be held and used for profit during a long growing season. We have the resources, the men and women for this work. Encourage industry and self-reliance for reclaiming this land. Nevada enlisted and sent 8 per cent of her population to war. We are just as earnest to build our State as we were to protect our Republic.

Our legislature should administer those lands for the mutual good of its citizens, and our Government for reclaiming and providing homes for soldiers, for building roads and schools, for economy of administration, for our inherent right under the Constitution called "free, equal, and independent Commonwealths." Close up your extensive, expensive administration of Nevada as an inducement to our self-reliance. All we need in Washington is a small bureau to furnish reliable information upon raw resources.

Conservation there prevents development and does not meet our peculiar needs; land without cultivation is like money out of circulation—earning nothing.

These lands, wind swept and sand blown, lie below a flow of water which at certain seasons runs riot with damage—beneath a long summer season, of long growing days, a growth for 10 months in the year, where crops and fruits of all kinds are produced, from a soil rich in phosphates and potassium, owing to the disintegration of mineral-bearing rocks. Suspicion against Nevada men is a hindrance to our Government, which seeks to provide homes and occupation to men who in times of peril gladly give their lives to protect us all. Government should furnish equal opportunity to all men and women who desire to work and build, to safely guard the weak, and stimulate the strong to great achievement. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of the chemical and physical character of road materials, for conducting laboratory and field experiments, and for studies and investigations in road design, independently or in cooperation with State highway departments and other agencies, $77,020.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUBEY. Insert on page 78, after line 14, a new paragraph, as follows:

"For conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction and maintenance, and investigations concerning various road materials and preparations; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the preparation and application of bituminous and other binders; for the purchase of materials and equipment; for the employment of assistants and labor; such experimental work to be confined as nearly as possible to one point during the fiscal year, $45,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment. It is new legislation on a general appropriation bill and can not be admitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, this item has been in the bill since 1912, and has carried since 1917 some $60,000. I do not think there is any question but that the language is clearly in order. I have placed it in the bill in identically the same place it has been carried in the bill during all these years.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state to the Chair the authority for its being placed in the bill in 1912?

Mr. RUBEY. I can only refer the Chairman to the organic act and to the act under which the Bureau of Roads was established. I have not examined the language with particular reference to this item.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri refer to the organic law establishing the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. RUBEY. Establishing the Department of Agriculture and also the law establishing the Bureau of Public Roads. I call the Chair's attention to this language in connection with the general expenses for the public roads. The law as it has been carried heretofore provides for conducting investigations and experiments, for collating and reporting and illustrating the results of the same, and for preparing, publishing, and distributing bulletins, and so forth. It also provides for supplies, fixtures, and apparatus, and road demonstrations of every possible kind and character.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman contend that there is any authority of law for any of these road items in the bill?

Mr. RUBEY. I think possibly, if points of order should be made against them, they would all go out.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. My recollection is that at one time they all went out on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair has referred to the authorization of law for the Bureau of Public Roads, and finds by reference to the Book of Estimates that the first authorization was made in the appropriation bill approved March 3, 1905. Subsequent to that date appropriations have been made and items carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill providing for various investigations and activities on the part of this bureau. But the Chair finds nothing in the organic act for the establishment of the Department of Agriculture authorizing this particular activity, nor does he think the very general language used establishing that department is sufficient to warrant this particular appropriation unless specific authority is found in some other law. The Chair does not believe that the establishment of this bureau making appropriations for these various activities in the annual appropriation bill or in the language used in the various appropriation bills is sufficient to warrant or to provide for their establishment as a permanent branch of the department. In the view of the Chair the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] is such activity as is not warranted by existing law, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating and reporting upon the utilization of water in farm irrigation, including the best methods to apply in practice; the different kinds of power and appliances, and the development of equipment for farm irrigation; the flow of water in ditches, pipes, and other conduits; the duty, apportionment, and measurement of irrigation water; the customs, regulations, and laws affecting irrigation; for the purchase and installation of equipment for experimental purposes; for the giving of expert advice and assistance; for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation; for the employment of assistants and labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for rent outside of the District of Columbia; and for supplies and all necessary expenses, $62,440.

Mr. SNELL and Mr. HARRISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the section, in view of the fact that the law does not authorize general investigations of this kind on appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. I know of no authority for the work in the organic act, as has been referred to by the gentleman from Missouri. I am inclined to concede it is subject to a point of order, and, as heretofore stated, I think a number of the items are subject to a point of order and would go out if a point of order were made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this is entirely different from a road proposition. Roads are not confined to agriculture. This proposition is for the purpose of investigating and reporting on the use of water in farm irrigation. Now, I have no doubt it is familiar to the Chair, as it is to everybody else, that irrigation is just as important on the farm as any other operation on the farm. We investigate the diseases of horses, and we investigate animals on the farm, of all sorts; we investigate the raising of wheat and corn and other farm products. Now, irrigation is just as much a part of the work of the farm as the raising of wheat or corn. That is not true in the State of New York or in the State of Illinois, but notwithstanding those two great States are very important in agriculture, they are not the only places in the country where there are farms. Now, the organic act authorizes the collection and diffusion of knowledge in its broadest sense, relating to agriculture. That certainly would include the use of irrigation on the farms. That is all this item is.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that this goes a great deal further than what the gentleman from Illinois has just explained. This goes so far as to the customs, regulations, and laws affecting irrigation, and the purchase and installation of equipment for experimental purposes. I maintain that this whole thing is a general investigation, that is absolutely prohibited from being carried on an appropriation bill, and the language is wide enough to designate it as a general investigation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It all comes under the head of water in farm irrigation, including these other things. All is a part of the utilization of water in farm irrigation, which is to obtain information, and designed, as provided by the bill, to be diffused among the people, relating to the raising of crops through irrigation. If that is not agriculture, what is it?

Mr. SNELL. I maintain that the proposition goes so much further than any special investigation that it could come under the head of a general investigation, which is prohibited on an appropriation bill. And I call the attention of the Chair to volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 3652:

While the statute authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make investigation of subjects relating to agriculture is held to justify a broad line of appropriation, yet it does not justify appropriations for general investigations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] makes the point of order to the pending paragraph. The Chair understands he bases his contention on the ground that it provides for a general investigation, which is not authorized to be made upon a general appropriation bill. From the language of the pending paragraph, taken as a whole, it seems to authorize an investigation and report upon matters connected with the utilization of water in farm irrigation and the preparation of reports and distribution of the results of that investigation. And the Chair may again refer to the organic act establishing this department, found in the Revised Statutes, second edition, of 1878, page 87, Title II, which provides for the Department of Agriculture:

The general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information of subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word.

It also provides for securing and preserving the information concerning agriculture by practical and scientific experiments, an accurate record of which experiments shall be made. It seems to the Chair, in view of the broad, general language used in the organic act, that this is such an investigation as would be authorized, and that it comes within the authority of the department to make investigation and diffuse the information concerning it among the people of the United States. The Chair does not think that this language, taken as a whole, provides for a general investigation, but rather a thorough investigation of a particular subject, namely, the utilization of water in farm irrigation.

The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, while the committee is on the subject of the building of public roads, I desire to call the attention of the committee again to a bill which is pending in this Congress and which if adopted by the House would be of great practical benefit to road construction in this country.

I have repeatedly urged the House to take up Senate bill 3037, adopt the committee amendments, and enact it into law. This bill is now on the calendar with the amendments proposed by the House Military Affairs Committee, and it has the practically unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Military Affairs. At the date of the signing of the armistice the Government owned great quantities of motor-propelled vehicles and quantities of all kinds of road-building implements and materials. Congress passed a law directing in very general terms the distribution of such of this material as the Government could not use to the highway commissioners of the several States for use in road construction, and the distribution was to be made amongst the States along the lines of distribution of moneys provided in the good-roads act for Federal aid to State construction. The terms of the act were broad and general, and the War Department has refused to act without more specific instructions.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. Has not that been done in part?

Mr. HARRISON. As to motor-propelled vehicles, the War Department has and is making distribution, but other road-construction material it is not and will not. There was a resolution passed through this House which simply requested the Secretary of War to turn over the motor-propelled vehicles, which the War Department was then engaged in doing, but it amounted to nothing. In the first place, the War Department was then doing what the resolution requested; and, in the second place, it was a mere request, without any possible vitality. It was mere partisan political camouflage, and apparently intended as such. If the purpose had been to really secure this road material for road construction on the part of the States, it would have been just as easy to have enacted the Senate bill into a law, which would have had the force of law, as to have passed the House resolution preferring a request on the part of the House. While the House has been thus playing the political game, the stores of road-construction material, not merely motor-propelled vehicles, have been deteriorating and being dissipated.

The waste has been almost criminal, and the people of the country are showing their weariness of the partisan treatment of practical matters. Almost every State highway commission has been appealing to Congress to have that law enacted. It seems to me that to let that material be dissipated or sold at a sacrifice, instead of being turned over to the public-highway commissions to be used for public-road construction, is a crime.

It is not the fault of the Military Affairs Committee, for the committee, as a committee, and the members, without regard to political affiliations, have sought to secure action. Mr. MCKENZIE, of Illinois, reported and asked for a rule to which the Rules Committee so far has turned a deaf ear.

We have all sorts of road-building implements and material simply lying idle in the hands of the War Department unutilized, and if this House would enact that Senate bill at once it would be capable of being distributed and put to practical use. The several States have appropriated this year over $700,000,000 in the aggregate for road construction. Many of the States have adopted their road program on the theory that they would receive this material, and great practical interests are at stake, but it seems impossible to get the power that controls the legislation of this House to take action. Everyone recognizes the vast importance of good roads to the rural, as well as the urban, communities. The States have shown their appreciation by the appropriation of vast sums, carrying the burden of heavy taxation. My own State, Virginia, has not been backward, but contemplates a forward and progressive movement, to secure for her people good roads. She has made a very large appropriation to meet an ambitious program of road construction. She must lay a heavy tax burden on her people to secure in the market, at heavy cost, the material which the Federal Government has no use for, and which is wasting and deteriorating because the Government can not adequately care for it. Here, then, is the situation: The States must have such material for road construction. If they have to buy it, it will be at great cost. The War Department has the material, which it can not use, which it is keeping at great waste, and which it can not sell except at a great sacrifice. The Senate has passed a bill permitting the people of the States, who are the people of the Union, to make practical use of this material, and the House has so far refused to take action, at great loss and detriment in the material. The time for road building is at hand, and if we intend to authorize the use of this material the time for legislative action is pressing.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Was the gentleman in here the other day when the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said he was trying to get some data on the subject? I think the trouble about it is that the steering committee has been too busy to function on it.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no question about the data. The data are at hand. They have been furnished to the Committee on Military Affairs. It has been acted on, as I say, unanimously, by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman know whether the Committee on Military Affairs has ever asked the steering committee if it could be brought up?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the Republican steering committee has ever acted upon that measure; and if not, why not?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.] The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating and reporting upon farm drainage and upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands which may be made available for agricultural purposes; for preparing plans for the removal of surplus water by drainage and for giving expert assistance by advice or otherwise in the drainage of such lands; for conducting field experiments and investigations concerning the construction and maintenance of farm-drainage work; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the construction and maintenance of farm-drainage structures; for the purchase of materials and equipment; and for preparing and illustrating reports and bulletins on drainage; and for the employment of assistants and labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for rent outside of the District of Columbia, and for supplies and all necessary expenses, $53,760.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order on the paragraph appropriating money for the construction of farm buildings. What page are we on, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 79, lines 4 to 18, inclusive.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Excuse me. I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating farm domestic water supply and drainage disposal, the construction of farm buildings, and other rural engineering problems involving mechanical principles, including the erection of such structures outside of the District of Columbia as may be necessary for experimental purposes only, the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $25,000.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, now I desire to make a point of order that that is legislation.

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order that the question of farm buildings is not authorized by the organic act.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no provision here for the construction of farm buildings. The gentleman has not read the paragraph carefully.

Mr. RUBEY. It is for the investigation of such construction.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Beginning on line 19, page 79, it says:

For investigating farm domestic water supply and drainage disposal, the construction of farm buildings, and other rural engineering problems involving mechanical principles, including the erection of such structures outside of the District of Columbia as may be necessary for experimental purposes only.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is not for the construction of other engineering problems. It is for their investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Bureau of Public Roads, $490,620.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last line.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this item of the Bureau of Public Roads ought to be considered for a moment in its broad sense, with reference to the conflict of our appropriations and work. We are appropriating here under the title of "Bureau of Public Roads" the enormous sum of $490,000. I have roughly counted up the number of employees in the first paragraph under the title of "Salaries, Bureau of Public Roads," and I find there are something like 110 or more employees there, together with the employees that come under these "expert-advice" items running through pages 78 and 79.

But the point I wish to make is that it does not carry with it the construction of a single inch of highway. Not one inch of highway is constructed under an appropriation of $490,000.

We also have a good-roads bill which in three years' time will appropriate $200,000,000. I believe that is the aggregate for the three-year period. That is proposed to go directly to highway construction; a most estimable proposition, provided it gets there. But the conditions in that bill are such that the actual division of that amount can not be made. In other words, here is a complete duplication. This is a good-roads proposition. It is supposed to be under an agricultural bill, calling for an appropriation of $490,000 without the building of an inch of road, as I say, and then later on you appropriate $200,000,000—$75,000,000 this year—for road construction.

That is another illustration of the fact that we ought to have a budget system and not have these duplications.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman know that the House of Representatives has already passed a budget bill, and that it is now pending before the Senate?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am only saying that I am delighted——

Mr. GARNER. I merely want to suggest to the gentleman that if he could help it along over there by making an argument before the Senate committee, it might help to bring about the end which we so much desire.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think we have work enough to do at this end of the Capitol so that we do not need to try to hurry up the people at the other end of the Capitol. I will cooperate with the gentleman to the fullest extent in pushing any possible legislation here. But let me say I am not making these remarks as derogatory of the Agricultural Department or of the Committee on Agriculture, but I am calling attention to what seems to me to be another indication of our governmental extravagance and slipshod way of doing business, and a willingness to make these enormous appropriations which are practically for the employment of good people in swivel chairs down town. You talk about wanting "expert advice"! On page 78 of this bill there is an appropriation—

For investigations of the best methods of road making, especially ordinary sand-clay and dirt roads, and the best kinds of road-making materials, and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance, $102,300.

I will ask the gentleman if he will not admit that a road supervisor in his county in Texas is a great deal better equipped to give that expert advice than some inquirer here in Washington experimenting scientifically on the subject?

Mr. GARNER. I do not think so.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do.

Mr. GARNER. I think these people who have conducted experiments in road-building materials and road building can give some very good advice to the people throughout the United States. But it is not incumbent upon me to defend the action of the Agricultural Committee in making this appropriation. The gentleman's party is in the majority and in command, and when he is making these criticisms he is criticizing the work done by his own party.

Mr. TREADWAY. Please do not take time to criticize the party. I am not taking any party viewpoint. I will say to the gentleman that there is nothing more essential to the welfare of my own individual district and of my home State than good roads; but what I am criticizing is the fact that we are trying to camouflage $490,000, which is not of the slightest use from a practical point of road construction.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts has called attention to the importance of building good roads, but he objects to investigations and furnishing expert advice as provided in this bill. The money has already been appropriated for the building of roads. It is made available by a permanent annual appropriation, which provides that the money shall be expended by the Department of Agriculture. As has been stated, the unexpended balance on the 1st of July, 1919, was $74,472,306. The appropriation for the present year is more than $95,000,000, a total of $169,472,306. On the 1st of July next $100,000,000 more becomes available. Still the gentleman believes that we should expend these hundreds of millions of dollars without investigations or expert advice.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is misrepresenting my attitude absolutely. I do not believe in any such thing.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman decries the bill because it carries an appropriation for expert advice on road building.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am decrying this particular appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman wants to be fair?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, yes; and so does the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman talks about the budget system. He criticizes the Department of Agriculture—the department that has the most efficient and practically the only real budget system of all the departments of the Government.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I want to congratulate the gentleman on defending his own bill for once while it is under consideration.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is mistaken in his inference. The gentleman will concede that with the activity and efforts made on his side of the House to increase the appropriations in this bill, to filibuster, and to defeat the bill, I have had my hands full to counteract the efforts. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. LAYTON. What is the use of the Government going into the question of furnishing water to farms?

Mr. HAUGEN. The drainage item is a different item.

Mr. LAYTON. It is in this same item.

Mr. HAUGEN. You have reference to the appropriation for drainage experiments. It has been carried in the bill for a number of years, and we believe some good work is being done in that direction.

Mr. LAYTON. I do not care if it has been carried in the bill a thousand years. The point is that I think governmental activities ought to quit somewhere, and the people themselves be allowed to exercise their common sense and work out some problems for themselves.

Mr. HAUGEN. My State and every other progressive State have spent millions and millions of dollars for drainage. We think it is a wise expenditure, and that information on that subject is of great importance.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Can the gentleman inform me how many employees are carried on pages 76 to 80, inclusive? I have counted up the number on pages 76 and 77, and there are about 115 of them, but in addition to that every other item is for expert advice and the employment of help, and so forth.

Mr. HAUGEN. There were some over 330 carried last year in the items to which the gentleman refers. It requires a large force.

Mr. TREADWAY. It must. I realize that.

Mr. HAUGEN. Those employed under these items supervise expenditures running into the millions.

Mr. TREADWAY. With an appropriation of $490,000, of course you have got to employ a good many people; but has the gentleman an estimate of the number of employees?

Mr. HAUGEN. There were 330 last year. There are some over that this year.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, the criticism by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] of this feature of the bill is so little justified, and the impression that he seeks to create would be so misleading, that I am moved to say something by way of reply to his speech.

He criticizes this appropriation as having no relation to the construction of a mile of public road, when, as a matter of fact, these appropriations are related to the construction of thousands of miles of roads in the United States, in every single mile of which the Federal Government has a vital interest. The Congress passed the Federal road act some years ago. It is now in full operation. There is not a mile of public road now under construction pursuant to that law which does not make a demand upon the Department of Agriculture. Under that act it is the duty of the Agricultural Department to see that the contributions which the Federal Government affords for road construction in the States are wisely expended. The act imposes upon the Department of Agriculture the specific task of approving, in the first instance, every project of road construction undertaken under the act, and the power of withholding the Federal contribution until it is satisfied that the work of construction has been properly executed. I would like for the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other critic of this part of the pending bill, to explain to this committee how this important function of the department in regard to the proper expenditure of Federal money can be discharged without expert assistance.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell how many miles of road are being constructed?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I can not; but I repeat most positively the statement that I made a few moments ago that thousands of miles of road are under actual construction at the present time.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell us how much has been expended so far?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I can not give the figures offhand. The gentleman can secure them from the department. But I will say this, that in the State of Virginia—and Virginia is not one of the States making the largest appropriations for road purposes—our quota of the present Federal fund is about $6,000,000, and we are arranging in connection with that amount to expend from fourteen to thirty million dollars of State money on the highways of Virginia. The Federal Government is intimately concerned with every dollar of its contribution to that expenditure.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. This is a situation with which I am fairly familiar, and I am glad to be interrogated.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know how much it costs for the construction of road per mile in Virginia?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No. That depends, naturally, upon the character of the road constructed and the country traversed.

Mr. MADDEN. The reason I ask the question is that up to the time the bill passed appropriating the money which is now available a limit of cost, as I understand, per mile of the roads to be built by the State was $10,000.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That has been advanced to $20,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Most of the roads in the State are costing from $26,000 to $40,000 a mile.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In Virginia we are building different types of macadam roads, possibly a little concrete construction, and soil roads. Soil roads cost from $4,000 to $6,000 a mile, in some counties even more, and when properly constructed they are admirable roads. It is the duty of the Federal Government, functioning through the Department of Agriculture, to see that every mile of this construction to which it contributes 50 cents on the dollar of cost is economically and properly expended; expended upon roads of a proper grade, a proper width, and conforming in every way to the requirements of modern scientific road construction. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts would give the impression that the activities of the agents of the Department of Agriculture to compel the judicious expenditure of Federal money are sheer waste and extravagance. I would like to ask the gentleman how he would deal with the situation, and secure a proper return for the contribution which the Federal Government makes to this great work of road construction in the States?

Mr. TREADWAY. I personally have felt that the question of road construction was a State matter from the very beginning, and, further than that, if I may add to it in reply to the gentleman's inquiry, I would ask him this question: To what extent must the local board supplement this very work for which we are appropriating this large sum?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is harking back to principles and objections that were considered and settled at the time that we passed the Federal road act. That is not material in this connection. We are dealing with the actual conditions confronting us under the present operation of that act. For every dollar of Federal contribution the Government can require a like amount or more from the States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Was not this item carried by the Agricultural bill long before the good-roads act was passed?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. To some extent. The passage of the Federal act and the consequent enlargement of the duties of the Department of Agriculture calls for a much larger appropriation in this connection. In a few years I expect to see far greater appropriations for engineers and experts in the Bureau of Roads. They will be imperatively needed to afford a proper oversight over the great sums which are now being expended upon the projects approved by the Department of Agriculture. From year to year expenditures in this direction will be greatly increased. I note that the new Secretary of Agriculture thinks that even now the Government should contribute at least a hundred millions of dollars annually to this great enterprise of cooperative road construction.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Massachusetts criticizes some of these items in a lump sum and calls attention to the fact that under them a large number of employees will be needed. He asked how many men will be employed under the lump-sum items. I answer him that there are 343 altogether; that in the city of Washington there are 37, and the others are to be employed outside of the city, all over the country, looking after road matters of one kind and another and the general work in which this bureau is engaged.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Markets: For salaries and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, furniture, supplies, traveling expenses, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other expenses necessary in conducting investigations, experiments, and demonstrations, as follows.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Chairman, a number of times during the consideration of this bill inquiry has been made as to how Congress can legislate in order to bring the prices of food back to a reasonable basis? The lengthy discussion indicates that the House is deeply interested in this problem. You are also anxious to enact laws that will make for the preservation and upbuilding of our great agricultural interests. That the present skyrocketing of prices are largely the result of the war which for four years has absorbed the energies of the world, causing a shortage in foodstuffs and resulting in competitive buying, no one will question. But the upward trend in prices can not be wholly charged to the madness of the past four years. Anyone who has given thought to our method of distribution can readily understand that our marketing system is responsible for the gradual upward trend of prices which has been apparent for many years. The present method is too expensive; it strikes at the welfare and happiness of the Nation; it has not kept pace with our advanced civilization. Distribution is in the hands of the manipulators and profiteers, and it is the most dangerous form of speculation. It is gambling pure and simple, gambling in the foodstuffs and the necessities of life. This old and faulty system has demanded too great a tax for the work it has done. Statistics show that the middlemen get $2 out of the consumer's $3. In other words, the man who for 10 years carefully tends his orchard, bringing it to a state of production, cultivating, gathering, and delivering his crop to market, only gets one-third of the consumer's dollar. The system that distributes the fruit gets two-thirds of the consumer's dollar. The farmer who intelligently informs himself how to make his acres productive, how to increase his yield of corn, wheat, potatoes, cotton, and beans, gets $1 out of the consumer's $3, while the man who sits at his desk directing the manipulations of distribution takes $2 of the consumer's $3. The charge for distribution is too great; it is a menace to the happiness and welfare of our people; it is entirely out of proportion to the service rendered. For years the producer has known who to blame, and for 50 years he has tried to organize his forces in order to come more directly in contact with the consumer. He has found it almost impossible to eliminate the profiteer from the system. The commission man, wholesaler, broker, and jobber hold tenaciously to their gains.

In order to make his business profitable he has realized that he must standardize his output. He has hoped for organization, so that he could advertise his product, which is so necessary to business success. He has looked forward to the time when he could stabilize his business, so that his income could be reasonably assured, but, above all things, he realizes the necessity of preventing the gambler and speculator from having control of the distribution of his product. The consumer is as vitally interested in securing these results as the producer is, for a large proportion of his money is absorbed in a way that tends to decrease rather than stimulate production. The producer is interested in cutting down the toll between producer and consumer, standardizing and advertising his products, and placing his business on a stable basis. If he is successful, if a part of the consumer's $2 which is now paid to the distributing system could be retained by the producer, his profits would be largely increased, production would be greatly stimulated, and the lowering and stabilizing of prices would surely follow. Every business man recognizes the necessity of cooperative enterprise in order to get the maximum results from effort expended. The farmer through his cooperative marketing associations is now solving this important problem. In California our progressive orchardists have taken a great step forward. Their marketing associations are not only bringing prosperity to themselves and wonderfully increasing production, but the consumer is being protected as to the retail price, as statistics that I have gathered conclusively show.

This Congress has indicated in numerous bills that have passed this House since I became a Member that they are anxious to give full protection to the farmers of this Nation. When the Clayton Act was passed by a former Congress this language was used:

> The labor of the human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit.

The language was most unfortunate, because no business enterprise could be expected to succeed without capital. It is as necessary for farmers' organizations to have capital stock as it is for any other business. Without it they can not get the credit necessary in operating their business. I have no doubt that the clear intent of the lawmakers of the Sixty-third Congress was to exempt the farmers in their organizations as well as labor in its organizations, but the courts have construed differently, and the organized farmers have been harassed under the provisions of this statute and their officers arrested and annoyed. As a result a feeling of uncertainty exists as to the stability of their organizations, which to a great extent has militated against their success and extension. Each succeeding Congress has in a perfunctory and unsatisfactory way endeavored to give protection to the organized farmers. The Sixty-sixth Congress went so far in the food-control act as to exempt cooperative associations of farmers from its sweeping provisions and virtually went on record in saying that a farmer can not only organize but he can willfully destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; that he could waste and permit deterioration; that he could hoard; that he could monopolize; that he could charge unreasonable prices by conspiring, combining, agreeing, or arranging with any person as to prices. This kind of legislation you passed in order that the cooperative organizations might continue to exist and in order that increased production should be encouraged.

The farmers of this Nation are asking no such exemption as this Congress has seen fit to give them. They are willing to rest under the provisions of the food-control act, as every citizen should be compelled to do, but they are insisting that they have a right to ask that the Congress clearly enact such a law that will definitely state that their cooperative marketing associations are not in violation of the Sherman antitrust law or the Clayton Act. Give them the right to organize to protect their industries, as you have given every other business the right to organize. Then it will not be necessary to continually exempt the farmer where he has no right or desire to receive special consideration.

Under the provisions of the deficiency appropriation measure you appropriated $200,000 for the enforcement of the antitrust law, but you provided that "no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose of maintaining a fair and reasonable price for their product." It seems to me that such legislation little befits the wisdom of able statesmen. You tell the Attorney General that he must prosecute the violators of the law, and appropriate $200,000 for him to do it with, and at the same time you say there is one violator of the law that you can not use this money to prosecute, and that is the farmer. It seems to me that this is legislation of the worst kind. If the farmer is in violation of the law you ought to prosecute him and you ought to let him know that you are going to prosecute him. If his associations are necessary to his prosperity and in the interest of the public, then our laws should state that such associations are not in violation of the antitrust laws or the Clayton Act. From the position taken by this Congress the farmers of this Nation have a right to demand the enactment of a law that will clearly set forth their position. If the farmers are to receive continued protection they should know it. If, on the other hand, they are to be adjudged criminals the knowledge should not be withheld. After their long struggle they are entitled to know how the lawmakers are going to deal with them.

It is entirely unnecessary for me to call to your attention the importance of agriculture to the prosperity of a nation. History points with no uncertainty to the fact that the downfall of the nations of the past has followed in the footsteps of a disappearing rural population. I take it that a nation's greatness and even her life is dependent upon maintaining a contented and prosperous rural population. The red flag never waves in the home of a farmer, neither is he a disturbing element in political or industrial life. The farm must produce a surplus of food and a surplus of virile and healthy men in order that the Nation may be fed and in order that the vigor of our urban population may not be abated. The greatness of a nation is in the altar erected in every farmer's home to the glory of God and to the preservation of the Union.

The fact that there are now pending before the Judiciary Committee bills that clearly give to the farmers of this Nation the right to organize in cooperative marketing associations for their own protection and for the mutual benefit of themselves and the consumer is well known to you, and you have no uncertain duty to perform when it comes to enacting laws for the proper protection of 35,000,000 of your people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Chairman, at a later date, when I can secure more time, I will further discuss this important subject. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

> For acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products and the purchasing of farm supplies, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the department, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the transportation, marketing, and distributing of farm and food products, $275,980: Provided, That of this sum $25,000 shall be set aside for the development of markets in the South American countries for agricultural products of the United States.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the proviso in lines 15, 16, and 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not want to take much of the time, but supplementing the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN], and addressing myself to the practical judgment of the members of the committee, I want to suggest that the criticism of the department and the criticism of our instrumentalities of distribution does not get us anywhere. We have had too much of the policy of destruction and criticism in this country. We get no results. It is not enough to scold. We have now reached the time when we must do some constructive work.

I want to renew the suggestion that these difficulties in distribution can never be corrected in this country until we standardize these commodities, so that they have a commercial status at the point of first concentration. Then, instead of spending money advertising these things for sale and sending Government agents over the country, establish a real produce-exchange system in the country, where these commodities may be listed for sale by description. Farm commodities move too far; the expense and waste are too great to ship them around to find a market. They must be sold by description. I direct the attention of the committee to the fact that since the days of the manorial markets of England the control and preservation of free market facilities have always been regarded as proper governmental functions. But modern conditions require that our general market shall be not a place to which the physical thing is carried but its description. It is the business of the Government to open wide, and keep wide, the doors of opportunity for free commerce. That is what I want this Government to do. When you do that you will not have so many antitrust laws, so many price-fixing laws, so many antiprofiteering laws, because you would build a bridge across which the average producer and consumer could reach each other in trade, just as buyer and seller used to go to the old market places, and when they wanted to trade they would be afforded a medium for trade adapted to our conditions, and automatically you would limit the total of the intervening charges imposed to the basis of the economic value of the service rendered by middlemen, and we would save food waste.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the paragraph before the committee, for I am always interested in what the gentleman from Texas has to say, but we must get on with this bill. It has been before the House now for seven or eight days. We should dispose of it to-day.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I say to the gentleman that I do not want to trespass upon the time of the House. I am one of those who take up very little time in debate. I think we ought to allot time here just as we do garden seed, and in that way shut out those people who insist on talking all the time, who have no ideas, and let a few of us who have ideas have a little time. [Laughter.] Of course, I am not referring to the distinguished leader of the majority. I only want to make one or two suggestions, and I trust the gentleman will kindly bear with me for a moment?

When you have standardized these commodities and have established trading through the system of contact suggested, then there must be that degree of intermediary supervision sufficient to give strangers confidence to trade with each other. As I remarked the other day to the Members of this House, there is nothing visionary about this. The principle of all I suggest is recognized in this bill. What I want to do is to connect up, coordinate, and make a workable machine. I am not a dreamer. I would not give a cent for anybody's theory. I want to know how it works. I was reared in the hills of Tennessee and never rode on a railroad train until I was 15 years old. I have been trained in the school of hard experience. I have studied this matter from every angle, and I know what I am talking about. I warn you that right behind this question of the high cost of living, just as certain as I stand here, is coming the question of where you are going to get something to eat.

There are now in existence practically all the necessary parts for the marketing machinery proposed by me. We have our National and State agricultural departments, with their agents scattered over the country. We have our Consular Service abroad. We have enacted warehouse legislation. I would provide for their coordination and their construction into a completed machine functioning as a unit in the sale and distribution of farm products.

I desire to direct your attention to the fact that what I am proposing is not to have the Government enter a new field of activity but to have the Government, in a field which it has long occupied, adjust its activity to the changed conditions which have developed in that field. The agricultural departments of the Federal Government and of the several States were organized to help agriculture deal with its big problems. There is no other justification for their existence. Agriculture comparatively recently has added to the two original problems, production and preservation of productivity, a third and most difficult of them all—that of sale and distribution. The latter has become the nerve center of agriculture. That is the place to work now. Profit alone can beget quantity and quality now and hold in the country enough people to preserve the fertility of the soil and provide our food and clothing material. Equal profit to that offered by other business is essential to the maintenance of vocational equilibrium. I merely propose the legislative recognition of these well-known facts.

AGRICULTURE MUST MEET THE BID OF INDUSTRY.

There must be given to the business of agriculture the ability to meet the competition of industries bidding for the population and productive energy of the country. I lay that down as a fundamental proposition. In undertaking to meet this bid agriculture is handicapped by the definite economic disadvantage that its commodities go to the market to the highest bidder, regardless of the cost of production and almost regardless of demand for use, while the industries of the city are able to write into their initial price the cost of production plus a profit, whatever that cost of production may be. The industries of the city, taken as a whole, compared to agriculture, do business on a "cost-plus" basis. It matters not what industries pay for the labor which they require or for their material, they write the cost into their initial price. Agriculture can not do that. The economic disadvantage in the competition, therefore, is perfectly apparent. Without taking from industry we must give to agriculture some compensatory benefit tending toward the possibility of maintaining an equilibrium of population resting upon the relative vocational needs of the whole people.

REDUCTION OF COST OF LIVING.

Those of us familiar with country conditions know that the profits of the farmers can not be reduced—I mean their net profits—for the reason that the farmers are losing their labor at the present profit. It is foolish to talk of reducing the profits to the farmers when we see the farmers' sons abandoning the farm for the city. Our hope of reducing the cost of living, in addition to what we may do toward reducing the cost of production, is in shortening the route and reducing the expense in distribution and in reducing the volume of food waste after production. The cost of these things very largely has shifted to consumers and constitutes no small part of the price which we are compelled to pay for that which we eat and wear. This waste reflects itself in everything else which we buy, because the food cost is a part of the overhead cost of everything.

SIMILARITY OF FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT.

We have enacted legislation which in the total incorporates all the principles contained in these suggestions; and we have enacted the Federal farm-loan act, which incorporates them all. That is an interesting fact and ought to be highly persuasive with regard to our need for and the probable efficiency of what I suggest. The Federal farm-loan act, with regard to which I had some small part, embodies the identical principles. You gentlemen understand that the difficulties encountered in the sale of rural credits were practically the same as are the difficulties encountered in the sale of rural products. To illustrate: A man on a farm had a credit for sale, he had a mortgage for sale, but the man with a little money to invest in a mortgage did not know of this demand for his money, and the man with the mortgage for sale did not know of this demand for his mortgage. If each had known with reference to the other, there still would have been no trade. The individual located in New England, for instance, could not have inspected a Texas farm, or, if he could have done this, his investment would not have justified the expense necessary to satisfy himself with regard to integrity of transaction. In other words, there was no practical medium through which trading relationship could be established, and this medium could not be created by anything less than what was done. We recognized this fact and enacted a law which has met in a highly satisfactory manner this condition, which had come as a part of the economic changes wrought by the great industrial revolution growing out of the application of steam and electricity to the industrial life of man.

Let us see what we really did for the sale of rural credits. Possibly I am taking too much time here, but this ought to be highly persuasive. First, we standardized rural credits by providing that they shall not exceed a certain percentage of the value of the land and a certain percentage of the value of the improvements; but that was not sufficient. Suppose we had done that and stopped there, as we have done with regard to certain of the agricultural products. That would not have gotten us very far, for the reason that the man in New England, for instance, who had cheap money to invest would not have known of the demand for his money and could not have made himself certain with regard to integrity of transaction. So we provided a rural credit exchange, a meeting place for supply and demand for rural credits. Through our land bank that is provided. This would not have been sufficient, so we went a step further and provided for the necessary inspection and supervision of transaction, to insure integrity of transaction. We constructed a bridge, safe and complete, to span the entire distance between supply and demand. That is exactly what is proposed by my suggestion for rural products.

WASTE IN DISTRIBUTION.

I wish I had the time to discuss the long, circuitous route and the enormous unnecessary expense in sending agricultural commodities, and especially perishable commodities, into the avenues of consumption; the enormous expense of holding carloads upon carloads of these commodities in the great concentration points, under shippers' orders, at the high expense of refrigerator cars, when they should have moved from point of first concentration to the point of need, avoiding physical deterioration, the hazards of getting into a congested market, reshipment, and a multiplicity of intervening profits. I would like to go into details and show you the absurd line of freight movements of these commodities. I wish I had time to show you the enormous food waste. I wish I had time somewhat to analyze the conditions under which it often occurs that the farmers can not get enough to justify the harvest of crops, produced at the highest expense in the history of agriculture, while the price to the average consumer holds him to a restricted consumption.

What is true of perishable products is also true of nonperishable products. With the marketing machinery suggested in operation, standardized, nonperishable commodities would also move, under prior sale, from the point of first concentration to the point of need. Nothing could be more absurd than the multiplicity of sales, hedgings, and reshipments of these products in the process of their commercial movement. With this machinery in operation a farmer or a group of farmers with a definite number of bales of cotton could list it by grade, and thereby not only place it in trading relationship with every demand for consumption in the world, but in the event of a disastrous slump in prices, such as we had last year, the stabilizing influence of the investing energy of the country could reach the actual commodity in distress. It can not do it now.

The same sort of thing would be true with regard to grain.

No one, perhaps, will agree with me now, but I know that live stock are capable of standardization and of being dealt in on an exchange. A good cowman can go into a herd of a thousand Hereford cattle ready for market, for instance, and can cut that herd into five lots of greater uniformity than any cotton expert can separate a thousand bales of cotton into. Besides, production would seek to meet standard requirements so as to avail itself of the benefits of this marketing machinery.

The position of producer would be more independent, with the commodity still at home pending sale by description, than with the commodity in some great center under deterioration and the high expense of maintenance. When sale is effected the commodity could move by the shortest and most direct route to the point of need without being drawn out of its natural channel of movement in order to clear through some great concentration center. With the reserve held near the point of production for final sale and with the reserve in direct trading contact with every market, stored or protected under standard regulation, we would have a real basis for personal and chattel rural credits.

The transportation facilities of the country would be relieved from their "crop-movement" strain and the extra equipment and expense necessary to care for these flood-tide movements.

I beg the committee also to consider this from another position. We have been looking from the producers' side toward the markets. Let us look from the market side toward the producers. Every demand for use, every little manufacturer, would have the whole producing area to draw directly from. He would be independent of the few great markets, which are, to say the least of it, under the suspicion of being capable of manipulation. And when the raw material reached his factory, it would arrive with only the necessary shortest freight-line movement charge against it, and the intervening expense and profit charges, which it had been more economical to incur than to do for himself the service for which the charges had been made.

This machinery would not eliminate necessary "middlemen." The "middleman" performs a necessary service and can render that service more economically for the public than the public can render it for itself. This machinery would be available to merchants, and by reducing their overhead expenses and the physical waste would enable them to reduce their charges, without the reduction of their net profits. By reason of the fact that it would be available, on an equally advantageous basis to everybody, it would hold, as I have stated, the total charge made to the basis of economic value of services rendered. It would broaden opportunity and give us a chance not only to keep real competition alive, but to escape the necessity of taking over the control and internal administration of business organizations.

It is absurd to try to destroy by prohibitory acts of legislatures or judgments of courts great organizations, at least, without providing a substitute. When we were on the headwaters of commerce a big bridge was not necessary. We have moved far down the stream now, and only a big bridge can span the distance. Our policy heretofore has been merely to dynamite the privately owned bridges of commerce when we thought their control monopolistic or the charges excessive. Of course, the public in each instance has had to pay for the repairs and the principal and interest on interrupted earnings. Ours should be a constructive rather than a destructive policy.

There is involved more than the mere food waste and the expense in distribution. There are possibilities in this sort of legislation far more important than the elimination of that which is unnecessary in these items. Such legislation would tend to remove the cause for the present growing demand for the direct governmental control of, or for the nationalization of, the avenues of distribution. It would take from distributors the power to "levy toll," and compel them to base their charges upon the economic value of the services rendered. The present difficulty grows out of the fact that there is no sort of arrangement in the machinery of distribution in this country through which the initial point of production can reach the final market.

There is no practical routing around the privately occupied channels of distribution through which supplies can reach demand. It is also highly important to have in mind that there is no sort of arrangement in the machinery of distribution in this country to throw back into the channels of production the unnecessary accumulation along the avenues of distribution. With the machinery of this bill in operation the total of the intervening charges would not rest, as now, upon the "toll-taking" power, but upon the basis of the economic value of the service rendered. You would substitute a self-regulating machinery, operating against excessive profits, for the main-strength-and-awkwardness policy which we have attempted to put into operation. You would open up the channel for control by the great laws of business, the law of supply and demand and associated laws, instead of the mandates of legislatures, as now.

Gentlemen, we can not regulate, permanently, the business operations of our country by the edict of legislatures, operating through a great number of people who go about the country with their pestiferous activities, responsible to various boards and bureaus of control. The business of government is to give to the laws which God has promulgated opportunity to regulate the affairs of men just as it is the business of the physician to give nature's laws the best chance to heal.

SMALL COMMUNITIES AND SMALL BUSINESS.

This bill seeks to construct a sort of public bridge over which the man of small business and the small community can reach the points of advantage, which now only big business touches.

It does not matter how difficult it may be, the little man must be given access to the initial market, and to the general market. I will say in passing that this is equally true of the products of the factory. Government must preserve for the average citizen the opportunity for individual effort, and a fair reward for that effort, made upon the responsibility of his own judgment and initiative. There must be a democracy in business opportunity or there can be no democracy in government. It is no answer to this proposition that a few great organizations can conduct the country's business more economically than it can be conducted otherwise. Theoretically, at least, the plan of government which holds the greatest possibilities for efficiency is an autocracy. Well may industrial efficiency be content with less than the immediate achievement of the maximum of its business possibilities, if there can be preserved the maximum of efficiency in the agencies which develop men who may be depended upon to continue its progress.

PENALTY OF NEGLECTED DUTY.

The troubles which now so menace us have largely grown out of the fact that we have been trying to operate in a steam and electricity age with an "ox-cart" policy of government.

I am asked why can not the farmers take care of this matter through a great, comprehensive farmers' organization. Possibly they could, but let us consider that from the standpoint not of the farmers particularly but of all the people. Do we find no warning in our present situation? Are we to repeat with agriculture the mistakes which we have made with regard to industry? When a common danger and a common cause was driving its operatives together into class solidarity, instead of recognizing that a new condition had brought to us a new problem as a challenge to the genius of our constructive statesmanship, we content ourselves with chanting a sort of inhibitory ritual which had been built up out of the sayings of great men who had lived in a by-gone industrial age. Deplorable and dangerous as is the present situation, there is nothing remarkable nor distinctive about it. From consciousness of power, whether possessed by kings, military chieftains, an organized nobility, church dignitaries even, organized capital, or humbler people standing in class solidarity, there goes forth its arbitrary and oppressive exercise, sometimes as an instrument in the hand of retribution.

Mr. Chairman, I am referring to these matters now merely for the purpose of analogy and illustration and of warning.

PUBLIC POLICY TO REMOVE NECESSITY FOR GREAT ORGANIZATION.

As rapidly as it can transpire, the farmers of this country, by their economic necessities, are being driven back upon each other into vocational cohesion, and this will come about unless the necessity is obviated by such legislation as is here proposed. The existence of that necessity is a national peril.

There can not be national solidarity nor real democracy among a people permeated by class consciousness or divided into vocational groups, organized for industrial conflict. There is more involved than the mere economic problems which I have touched upon. The good of our country calls to us to save for it now, unsegregated and unprejudiced, its great farming citizenship. If we are to weather the storm which seems to be about to break it will probably be largely through the strength which this Nation shall draw from the men of the fields. In the great crises of the past when governments and civilizations have been put to the supreme test their strength for the struggle and for the recuperation, when they survived, they drew largely from those who worked in the sunshine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the proviso in this paragraph is that $25,000 of the sum carried in the paragraph shall be set aside for the development of markets in the South American countries for agricultural products of the United States. I do not think that is warranted by any law. I do not know just what the demand is for the item. We have now in the State Department a lot of people employed in South America. We afterwards provided for the employment of a number in the Department of Commerce, duplicating to a large extent the work of the State Department, until recently there has been a demand that the work of these two departments be in some way consolidated instead of having them continued as they are. If we start the Agricultural Department in the employment of agents in South America, we will then bring about a triplication of the work. It is not entirely satisfactory to have Government agents abroad employed under the Department of Commerce and not under the Department of State. Of course, I am quite willing to help sell agricultural products abroad, although I do not think we ship a large amount of agricultural products to South America.

Of course, we do send some blooded stock, and there are some other agricultural products that we send. I doubt very much, unless the gentleman can give a very strong reason, the desirability of having all the various departments of the Government start in doing the same work.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that for some eight years I have been on this committee, and I am familiar with the hearings on this particular item, and particularly with the testimony given by Mr. Harrell, of my State, who is a breeder of thoroughbred cattle. He is a distinguished citizen of that State, a man now getting up in years, and quite a successful man. The Secretary of Agriculture asked Mr. Harrell, in view of the change of markets by reason of the World War, to take the time to make a trip to South America with a view of seeing what the outlook was with reference to opening up the markets in some of these South American countries for the thoroughbred herds of cattle that we were producing in this country. He took that trip. He is not an employee of the department at all; he is simply a private citizen, and he took that trip and came in contact with the people. Knowing their language, he came in contact with not only the people constituting the Government down there but with the great ranch owners and farmers. While the language in the bill seems to indicate agricultural products generally, the testimony related specifically to the finding of these markets for the thoroughbred cattle of this country.

Mr. Harrell went through Brazil and entirely across the South American Continent. He found this condition to exist, namely, that England was already on the ground, seeking to preempt the field, as they have preempted it very largely in Argentina.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. From the statement he made to us it showed that those people were disposed to be very friendly at this particular time, and that they are ready to open up that great country to the people of our country who are producing these thoroughbred herds. And not only Mr. Harrell makes this statement to us, but he went from our committee to some of the stockmen's organizations in Chicago and presented the information to them that he obtained down there. The Department of Agriculture did not recommend this item, but on the very interesting statement that Mr. Harrell made this committee unanimously felt that if we could appropriate $25,000 at this time to help open up that field we could probably get in there, and that we would have a market and a field there which, if we do not preempt now, will be preempted by England.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman know how many thoroughbred cattle we have shipped to South America in the last 10 years?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I do not. I am not informed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Or how many they have imported there from elsewhere?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Argentina has, as I say, been preempted by the English people.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Argentina, I will say to the gentleman, has imported a great many thoroughbred cattle from the United States as well as from England. England has not preempted it. We own the packing institutions down there; we buy the cattle from the people who raise them in Argentina in the main, and they have imported great numbers of American bulls for use with herds in Argentina and elsewhere in South America. This is no new field. This is an old one.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Let me say to the gentleman that as a part of that testimony this view was brought out, that as to Brazil and that great section of country the kind of cattle there, as described to us by Mr. Harrell, is very largely a kind of cattle that we formerly had in Texas. They are the wide-horn fellows, but are scrubs.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They are not the wide horns, but they are little cattle, very different——

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. They are little cattle, but with wide horns. I have seen those animals myself.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In Texas, but not in Brazil.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. In Texas you do not find those scrubs now. You find there thoroughbreds and high-grade cattle. If we can get into Brazil and open that market to the gentlemen who are producing these thoroughbreds, I believe it is a market well worth looking after, and this $25,000 will be well spent. That was the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the committee made it without much information, though I do not desire to reflect on them. There is a market in South America, not only in Argentina and Brazil but in Uruguay and Paraguay and Venezuela, for that matter, and they are buying them now to a considerable extent. Now, we have great cattle associations in the United States, for Shorthorns, Herefords, Holsteins—we used to call them Dutch Frisians when I was importing cattle—and those associations want to sell their stock. We have associations in relation to horses, and they want to sell their stock. They would send a live man to South America to sell their stock, and they can well afford it. We would probably send a dead man.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will if I can.

Mr. LAYTON. That is this: Does the committee know whether or not England is operating in South America with public money or whether Englishmen in their individual capacity are using their own money in order to get into that section?

Mr. TINCHER. This gentleman that was before our committee—and that was one of the points I asked—stated that the English representatives there were in an official capacity. That is one of the arguments he made as to why we ought to have a man there. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Illinois that our man may not be as alive as he ought to be. However, he will have Government recognition. We did not increase the appropriation for the Bureau of Markets in this, but we did vote unanimously for them to use $25,000 in this way, and I believe it will be the best $25,000 the Bureau of Markets will spend out of the appropriation. We did not increase the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order against the proviso. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I make it against the proviso, unless I can get the amount reduced.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order against the proviso in the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 14, by striking out "$275,980" and inserting "$250,980."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 82, line 14, strike out "$275,980" and insert in lieu thereof "$250,980."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the estimate for this item was $347,980. The amount reported, $275,980, represents a cut of $72,000 from the estimate of the department.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. It is a fact, is it not, that the committee added this provision without increasing the amount?

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I certainly have no desire to criticize the great Committee on Agriculture. I have the highest respect for all of its members, and will say now that I congratulate the chairman and the committee on the work that they have done on the bill this year. But one of two things is certainly true, either this $25,000, which I proposed to strike out, is unnecessary, or else the committee ought to have included it in the bill as they brought it in. We have stricken out an item of $25,000 which they proposed. They said that it was necessary. Now they say we ought not to reduce the total amount by the $25,000. Either the total amount was not large enough before or now it is $25,000 too much. The committee can take their choice about that, but they can not defend both propositions with logic.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. RUBEY. I will say to the gentleman that this paragraph was stricken out just as the committee was closing its work. I suggested that we ought to do something for opening up that market for our cattle. I suggested that we add to the bill in a provision for markets an item for $25,000. It simply went in as a proviso, without our taking into consideration the question as to just the point where it should go.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then I take it that the committee, in its wisdom, having decided that $275,980 was necessary for the purposes of this paragraph, then decided that they would take $25,000 of the necessary sum away and use it somewhere else. I have no complaint. I know these things frequently happen in committees, utterly regardless of logic.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me state what was done: The committee in going over the estimates agreed upon $275,980. When we were about to report the bill the matter of sending representatives to South America was discussed, and it was decided that we ought to set aside $25,000 for that purpose. The committee decided, however, not to appropriate an additional $25,000 to be used for this purpose, but to take the amount out of one of the larger items that we had agreed upon, and as a result the proviso was added to this item. We thought this work was of so much importance that we should set aside $25,000, even if it would amount to a reduction of the item to which it was added.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw my amendment, knowing that I have no chance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To make investigation relating to the transportation, storage, preparation, marketing, manufacture, and distribution of agricultural food products, including the extent, manner, and methods of any manipulation of the markets or control of the visible supply of such food products, or any of them, by any individuals, groups, associations, combinations, or corporations, $45,620.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out "$45,620," on page 83, line 23, and substitute "$50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Page 83, line 23, strike out "$45,620" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000."

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph refers, among other things, to the distribution of agricultural food products. The other day, early in the discussion of the bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] volunteered a reference to one of the methods of distribution, namely, the motor-truck service, and stated in that connection that the service had not resulted in putting the producer in direct contact with the consumer, not even to the extent of a single pound. I thought my friend must be in error, and I made an inquiry of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I now have a very brief letter from that official, which I desire to have read in my time by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter referred to will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 7, 1920.

Hon. R. WALTON MOORE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: In compliance with your telephonic request for information relative to the accuracy of the statement that appears on page 2585 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 6, 1920, and which reads as follows:

"I wish to say, as a member of the Post Office Committee, having made a thorough investigation, * * * that I can give the gentleman absolute assurance that not one single pound of farm product has ever reached the ultimate consumer directly, except it may be some one in the Post Office Service. * * *"

I submit herewith a list of the names and addresses of approximately 1,000 ultimate consumers, domiciled in Washington and elsewhere, few if any of whom are in the Post Office Service, who have each received more than 1 pound of farm products direct from the producer thereof at prices from 10 to 60 per cent below that which they would have had to pay for the same product on the same day upon which it was delivered by parcel post.

This list is limited to only a fraction of those who actually have been supplied, any of whom I suppose could be called upon to confirm the fact that the cost of living had been slightly reduced to them.

I am pleased to substantiate Congressman MADDEN'S declaration as set forth on page 5286, as follows:

"Some facilities must be furnished by somebody somewhere to meet the demands for the distribution of the products of the labor of the land."

And I can patiently await the day when that "somebody somewhere" will be the postal employee in the Postal Service everywhere, who will be authorized and used to supply the demand for distribution through the only competent instrumentality therefor that is already established, already available, already in existence in the country.

It may require some time to remove the restrictions (particularly the present basis of compensation of rural carriers and the use of motor-propelled vehicles) which prevent the postal enterprise from performing its full function of service to the people, but they will be removed, and I trust that it then will be made a matter of record that, whether as a dreamer or not, I have endeavored to present at this time a definite, specific program or remedy.

Yours, very truly,
JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not care about having the list of 1,000 consumers, which is attached to the letter, go into the RECORD, unless the committee desires it. That list will be found to include several Members of Congress, so that there are not only outside witnesses but witnesses here in this Chamber, if anybody desires to consult them.

I now withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to take the other side on the amendment. I think Mr. Blakslee confirms the statement I made on the occasion to which he referred, for he admits in his letter that most of the people, at least, were postal employees.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; he does not admit that.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, he does. I am making this speech, and I assert now again that no person ever received any food product through the truck service conducted under Mr. Blakslee's direction unless it was either the postal employees or somebody who had influence enough with the Post Office Department to enable them to get the products and have discrimination practiced in their favor through the elements that control the truck service in the Post Office Department.

It is true that they had some cooperative organization in the District of Columbia to which supplies were delivered. It may well be that through this cooperative organization they could select the names of a thousand people to whom distribution could be made or would be made or was made; but I still contend that no food supply was delivered direct, except under the circumstances I have named before and again name now, and that whatever was delivered, even though it may have been delivered to the consumer for less than it could have been purchased elsewhere for, was delivered at the expense of the Federal Treasury. If 1,000 people had food products delivered, it cost the Government $300 for each person served.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not yield.

Mr. BEE. I suppose not.

Mr. MADDEN. And if the Members of Congress who have already received supplies through the truck service had sufficient influence with Mr. Blakslee to get deliveries made to them, then I am sorry that such a practice was permitted to be inaugurated or to exist, because the last of all the people in the United States who need the interposition of the Government in their individual living costs are Members of Congress who are drawing large salaries. The statement made by Mr. Blakslee to justify the organization which he calls upon the Treasury to make large appropriations for annually was that he would be able to deliver food supplies to the consumer. Now, he is willing to admit in his statement that no such deliveries were made except to a selected few in the District of Columbia, some of whom are Members of Congress. That is a nice statement to go to the public as an argument for economy in the expense of living. I assert without fear of successful contradiction that there has been no reduction in the cost of living anywhere as the result of any governmental expenditure, but on the other hand that every Government expenditure made simply adds by the amount of that expenditure to the cost of living, and that the time is not here now and it will not be, though Mr. Blakslee may dream about it, when the Post Office Department will be permitted to enter upon a campaign to drain the Treasury dry in order that he may be able to serve a few influential people, including Members of Congress, with food at Government expense. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan: Page 83, line 18, strike out the word "manufacture."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is the Bureau of Markets, and we are providing for investigating market methods. This item as it stands would improperly, I believe, authorize an investigation of the "manufacture" of all food products. When the Chief of the Bureau of Markets was before the committee I asked him if that language was not too broad, and if he thought he has authority to investigate, or if it is within the purview of the Bureau of Markets to investigate, the manufacture of food products; he said "No," and that he thought the word "manufacture" might very well be omitted from the bill.

I have the Book of Estimates before me, and I have a memorandum to the effect that that word is to be stricken out. My recollection is that the committee decided to strike it out. Evidently there is some difference of opinion about it, although I think those who arrive at a conclusion different from mine are not correct.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan, this item received a good deal of consideration, the word "manufacture" was discussed, the committee passed the item, and later returned to the item, and approved the insertion of the item in the bill without discussing the word "manufacture" further. I do not believe any member of the committee is very much interested in it one way or the other.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is the leader of the steering committee on the majority side, it has been asserted, is always loud in his opposition of anything of benefit to the farmer, and it is apparent that he now carries his opposition to the welfare of the consuming class of people, since he finds fault with the letter written by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in reference to direct supplies of farm products to the consumer in the city of Washington through the medium of the truck service and the parcel post.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not make objection to the parcel post. My objection is to the trucks. The gentleman should quote me accurately.

Mr. GARD. I certainly desire to quote the gentleman accurately, since it has been asserted what his attitude is, and I think his attitude is very generally understood on the floor and throughout the country. But his interpretation of the letter of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General is not correct, since the letter in express language says that he appends a list of approximately 1,000 ultimate consumers domiciled in Washington and elsewhere, "few, if any, of whom are in the Post Office service."

To show the extent of the Post Office service—and it is a most excellent service, despite what the gentleman from Illinois has said—I call his attention to this long list of people, including Members of Congress, who certainly are interested in living conditions here. The gentleman from Illinois fortunately has so much of the world's means at his command that he is not as interested as are those of us who have more modest incomes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not have sufficient influence with the Post Office Department to get them to notify me when the truck was coming around to deliver goods at Government expense. Perhaps the gentleman has.

Mr. GARD. It was entirely open to the gentleman to do so had he so chosen. I desire to say that in the list which I have, handed me by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], I note the name of Representative RAMSEYER, of Iowa, who received some goods in this way. I note the name of Representative KELLY of Pennsylvania, who has received supplies through the truck service. I note the name of Attorney General Palmer and of Representative STEVENSON and of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] and others who are interested in having supplies brought directly to them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman from Illinois had displayed the same energy in soliciting the truck service to bring him supplies that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole displays in demolishing the gavel, I am sure he would have had the benefit of this service. Everybody knows that here in Washington prices to the ultimate consumer have been higher than any other place in the United States; and I can say that only yesterday, from down here within the 50-mile zone in Maryland, I got 3 dozen fresh eggs in a case, for 60 cents a dozen, that were delivered through the truck service, and came to my place of residence in the city of Washington; and the price of 60 cents a dozen is 14 or 15 cents cheaper per dozen than the price at any store in Washington where I have been able to buy eggs.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman tell us how he did it, because we are all interested?

Mr. GARD. I can do it readily.

Mr. CANDLER. Let me say that a gentleman told me this morning that he paid $1.05 a dozen for eggs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have one minute more to tell the gentleman from Illinois how he did it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have one minute more to tell the gentleman from Illinois how he did it. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. GARD. If I can not tell the gentleman publicly, I will tell him privately.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will tell us how he did it.

Mr. GARD. I saw published in the Washington newspapers some several months ago an item to the effect that the truck service was to be inaugurated that would send articles of merchandise like eggs, potatoes, butter, dressed chickens, and things of that kind to the consumer which could be purchased through the Post Office Department from farmers in the surrounding country. I called in person at the Post Office Department——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whom did the gentleman call on?

Mr. GARD. The First Assistant Postmaster General. I was told that there was a department in the Post Office Division that was taking charge of the matter. I went there and told them what I wanted, and said I would be pleased to get in correspondence with some one within the 50-mile zone who might furnish me with a limited supply, according to my necessities and my capacity to pay. The name of a man was given me at Cooksville, Md. I wrote a letter asking him if he could send me the supplies. He wrote that he could. I bought an egg crate, sent it by parcel post, and this man returned it to me filled. I returned him a postal order in payment therefor. That in brief is the system of acquiring eggs. [Laughter and applause.] I commend it to the gentleman and all other persons who wish to reduce the high cost of living, or at least to take advantage of this service directly from the producer to the consumer, which is so well being carried on by the Post Office Department.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman did not get his supplies through the truck service at all; he got them through the parcel post, with a Government agent acting as salesman for the man who had the stuff to sell.

Mr. GARD. All I have to say is that unless the truck had brought them in I would not have got the eggs.

Mr. MADDEN. They came in on the train.

Mr. GARD. No; they came in on a truck.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that a part of this appropriation is for the purpose of enabling the bureau to investigate the manipulation of markets and the control of visible supplies. What do they propose to do with the information when they get it? My general criticism behind that inquiry is that we have too much investigating, too much study, too much accumulation of information. What we want and what we need is the application of the information we already have. I was wondering what they were going to do with it.

Mr. HAUGEN. The work is in connection with the Market Service. It is, of course, distributed the same as other information collected by this bureau. The item is broad, you will note.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If they find that a market is being manipulated, what are they going to do about it?

Mr. HAUGEN. They will distribute the information through the same channels as other information obtained. They had investigations of stockyards when they were under the license system. As a result of the information obtained they revoked the license.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of the United States cotton-futures act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States cotton-futures act, as amended March 4, 1919, including all expenses necessary for the purchase of equipment and supplies; for travel; for the employment of persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and for all other expenses, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, that may be necessary in executing the provisions of this act, $142,611: Provided, That the amendments to said act contained in section 6 of the act of March 4, 1919 (Public, No. 348, 65th Cong.), are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I notice that this paragraph refers first to the cotton-futures act as amended March 4, 1919, and then there is a proviso that the amendments to said act in section 6 of the act of March 4, 1919, are hereby recognized and declared permanent legislation. I do not recall the provisions in section 6 of the act of March 4, 1919. I judge from this that there were some temporary amendments to the cotton-futures act.

Mr. HAUGEN. The amendments to the cotton-futures act referred to were carried in the wheat price guaranty act of March 4, 1919. That act expires this year. The contention is that inasmuch as the act in which the amendments are carried is war-time legislation and expires during this year, the question might also be raised as to the amendments carried therein, also expiring with the act. In the opinion of the committee that was not the intention of Congress at the time the amendments were enacted. To remove any doubt as to the intention of Congress we inserted this provision.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no such thing as permanent law. The bill provides that the amendments in said act are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation. There is no such thing as permanent legislation. If a law is passed, it is law.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman does not object to this?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think where you want to enact legislation you ought to set it out not by recognizing something that is not a law and say we declare that to be permanent legislation. Nobody can tell what the law is if we get into a habit of that kind. There are two or three places in the bill where that sort of legislation is proposed.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the committee contemplated exactly what the gentleman has called attention to, but the contention was that if the amendments were set out in full and reenacted it would open up the question as to the merit of the amendments and might open up a lengthy and indefinite discussion and possibly further amendments to the act which the committee did not wish to take up during the discussion of this bill on account of the limited time allowed. It was the thought of the committee that the simplest and most expeditious way of handling the matter was to insert this proviso suggested by the department. We thought it unnecessary at this time to discuss the cotton futures amendments, although I think that act can be improved upon, and I would like to see it amended so as to make it more effective, so that it would mean something more to the cotton grower. However, that is neither here nor there now. If we are to amend the act, I think the amendments should be reported to the House in a separate bill—not attached to the appropriation bill. This proviso is merely to declare the intention of Congress as to the amendments that were carried in the wheat-guaranty act. The Agricultural Committee reported that act, and I do not doubt but that every member of the committee intended at the time the amendments were enacted that they should be permanent law, as indicated in this proviso. It is merely to clarify the amendments.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, it would have been subject to the point of order just as this proviso is. I frequently have sympathized with the efforts of gentlemen to enact legislation without letting the House know what it was, for fear they would amend it or change it, and I have helped more than once to enact legislation, endeavoring in that way to keep the House from amending it, and yet, on the whole, I have never tried to pass language saying that such and such a thing is permanent legislation by a mere reference to another statute. I do not think it is the proper method of legislation. It is for the House to determine, and if the gentleman wants to make it into permanent law it is for the House to determine whether it shall be so amended or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word——

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman going to discuss the point of order?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I want to explain——

Mr. MONDELL. The point is going to be made, and why at this late hour, on the eighth day of the discussion of this bill, should we discuss a matter that is not going to be in the bill?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I am going to make an explanation and then ask the gentleman to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman does withdraw it, I am going to make it.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. If the gentleman wants to destroy a great industry by doing that, he can go ahead and do it. He has the power to do it, and if that is his method of doing business, he may proceed.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the gentleman knows perfectly well——

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. And when the gentleman is doing it he is playing into the hands of the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not destroying any industry or hurting any industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I make the point of order against the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of the committee to what is being done under this section of the bill. At this time the Department of Agriculture is grading, in the first instance, cotton tendered on the New York and the New Orleans Cotton Exchanges. The gentlemen of the committee will recall that in my discussion of this bill under general debate, in which discussion I suggested to the House the character of marketing machinery necessary under our present circumstances, I stated to you gentlemen that practically everything advocated by me had received legislative sanction. We have already had under consideration those items in this appropriation bill dealing with the standardization of farm products, and you gentlemen are aware that time and again we have given legislative sanction to this procedure by the standardization of many of our agricultural products. That is the first proposition insisted upon by myself and is the first provision in the bill which I introduced first in 1914. In this item of legislation under consideration we recognize the economic necessity of exchanges for agricultural products. That is the second item in the bill which I introduced in 1914, or, rather, I should say that the second provision in the bill has to do with the establishment of farm-products exchange. And in this item, as stated, we provide for the intermediary supervision and inspection of commodity by the Government. These are the three chief features of the bill referred to, and in this bill before us we carry items of appropriation for an advisory dispatching service of commodities moving to market.

It is unfortunate, in my judgment, that legislative recognition of the principle of the bill referred to has come in this disconnected way, because the failure to properly relate and properly coordinate these various governmental activities prevents the satisfactory operation of any of them.

I am directing the attention of the committee now to these facts chiefly for the reason that there have been Members of the House disposed to regard the plan suggested by myself as being visionary and impracticable. While I appreciate the legislative recognition of the principles of the bill which I have introduced, I do not agree with the method of application. Take this particular item, for instance. Here we have an activity of the Federal Government dealing with the sale and distribution of cotton. That activity is located at the two great future markets of the country. Instead of having this activity located there, I am insisting that it should be located along the line of a natural movement of cotton, moving in the channels of legitimate commerce, so that producers and consumers of cotton could have the benefit of this service instead of the benefit being limited entirely to those who engage in transactions on the "future" boards in this country.

As a matter of fact, gentlemen, it is absurd to regard the New York and the New Orleans Cotton Exchanges as produce exchanges through which cotton may move naturally in commercial transactions. I make the statement without fear of contradiction that the deliveries, especially under New York contract, are not transactions taking place in the normal movement of cotton to consuming markets. It is not necessary to go into an analytical discussion of the transactions had on these exchanges to establish this fact. In order for cotton to be delivered on a New York contract it must be shipped into the city of New York and carried to one of the warehouses recognized by the New York Cotton Exchange. There it is sampled, classified, and certificated. We all know that the cotton crop moving to the consuming markets moves along many avenues of physical transportation. Relatively little, if any, commercial movement would be through the warehouses of New York City. This expense creates a commercial differential against transactions on this exchange which makes it unworkable as a general cotton exchange, through which a large part of the crop could normally move. In the second place, it is a fairly accurate general statement to say that a cotton mill will not use more than the three grades of cotton. The contract dealt in on these exchanges is, as the gentlemen understand, upon a basic grade, and delivery upon any contract may be consummated by the delivery of any or all of a large number of grades.

In so far as the user of cotton is concerned, if the delivery is made out of the cotton which he does not spin, he had just as well have boots or wool or any other commodity which he can sell delivered to him, because he would have to find a buyer for what he received. Everybody knows this, and yet this inspection and classifying service, so much needed to facilitate legitimate transactions in cotton, is located at a place where normal, legitimate commercial transactions do not take place. I want this service which we have established put in operation, so that it may serve the legitimate purposes of actual commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of the United States grain-standards act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States grain-standards act, including rent outside of the District of Columbia and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $538,623: Provided, That section 6 of the said act is hereby amended, effective on and after the passage of this act, by striking out of the last sentence the words "made after the parties in interest have had opportunity to be heard."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the proviso.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I make the point of order on the prosivo.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order on the proviso. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Completion of wool work: To enable the Bureau of Markets to complete the work of the domestic wool section of the War Industries Board and to enforce the Government regulations for handling the wool clip of 1918 as established by the wool division of said board, pursuant to the Executive order dated December 31, 1918, transferring such work to the said bureau, $15,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the Chairman and the committee to the way in which our sheepmen were treated by this very board in the handling of their wool under Government control in 1918. They were led to believe that they were to get a certain price for their wool when they knew they could get probably double the amount, but they realized that the country was engaged in war. They were patriotic. They immediately agreed to accept the price offered by the Government representatives. They understood that that was a definite, fixed price, so that every woolman in the country would know exactly what he was going to receive for his wool of a certain grade. Their clips of wool were placed in warehouses, and many of them drew no money on them at all. When the Government appraisers went around to these various warehouses, in some instances they were men sent out not in the interest of the Government particularly, not in the interest of the woolgrowers, but in the interest of the wool buyers, the manufacturers, if you please, of this country. While the price was agreed to be fixed at such an amount, yet such an unreasonable per cent was deducted for scouring that our sheepmen received in many instances only about half of what they had a right to expect they would receive under their agreement with the Government. Some of the most patriotic sheepmen of this country were virtually robbed out of their wool clips, in the growing of which many of them have gone into debt to such an extent that it took the greater portion of the proceeds to settle up; and their wool was held in warehouses for nearly a year before they could get a single cent on it, and when they did get money they got about half what they should have gotten under the agreement. Up to this time they have not been able to get any rectification from the successor of this board, that is now controlled by the Agriculture Department. I call the attention of the chairman and his committee to the fact that, in the interest of the woolmen all over the Southwest, something ought to be done on the part of this Government to see that they get a square deal, and get it promptly, under this provision of the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that certain profits were fixed, and the wool buyers charged larger profits. Those excess profits have been collected, and the money is in the Treasury, and that money is to be refunded to the woolgrowers.

Mr. BLANTON. When? It must be done promptly.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is in the power of the department.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the Agriculture Department going to deem this as a specific direction to take these claims up and settle them promptly? The Secretary should understand that he is empowered and instructed to do that. Will this committee so instruct this new Wool Division in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. HAUGEN. They have done that already.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that the woolmen of west Texas have become discouraged and are tired of waiting, and have not received any of it, and they have not had any promise of it, and have not even had a look-in on a square deal, because I have been with several of them to the department on this question.

Mr. ANDERSON. The very item that the gentleman is wasting his time on contemplates that very thing.

Mr. BLANTON. I wanted to be sure that the Agricultural Department would understand that these men are going to get a square deal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from Iowa rises in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this wool proposition that has just been under discussion, and I wondered what steps the Bureau of Markets intended to take.

Mr. HAUGEN. The department, since the transfer of this work to it, has been collecting the money—the overpayments—and expects to return it to the rightful owners. There were excess profits charged during the war. Last year the work of the domestic wool section of the War Industries Board was transferred to the Department of Agriculture, and the department is now collecting these excess profits and expects to distribute them to whom they rightfully belong.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I can give the gentleman a little information concerning the matter, which, however, may not be of particular value. I am informed that there has already been covered into the Treasury Department to the credit of the claimants about $250,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. I believe an amount considerably more than that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. How is the distribution to be determined?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The claims, I am informed, are in process of being considered. I can not tell you when the distribution is to be made, but, as I understand, the officials of the Agricultural Department expect it to be made at an early date.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is correct. The work may not be completed by the end of the present fiscal year, and for that reason the committee reports this small appropriation. The department did not estimate for it, but the committee thought that this amount of money should be available in order to carry on the work of distributing the excess profits collected if they have not been entirely distributed by the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Texas. One more question. Are these woolgrowers to be notified?

Mr. HAUGEN. I presume they are. That, of course, is an administrative matter for the department.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I think this ought to go in, in order to clear up the record. As a matter of fact, the Department of Agriculture had nothing to do with the fixing of the price of wool. That was an entirely different board, and the unfinished matter is being turned over to the department, and they have found the discrepancies and they are trying to straighten them out.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is correct. The domestic wool section of the War Industries Board was transferred to the Department of Agriculture a year ago. The department has merely been continuing the investigations of collections and distribution of the excess profits. As I stated, a large sum has been recovered to the credit of these people.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Are they making an investigation of the claims that have been filed or the whole matter?

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand they are investigating the whole matter.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MORGAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 10, 1920:

H. R. 1812. An act making an appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States;

H. R. 9112. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to loan Army rifles to posts of the American Legion; and

H. R. 10701. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Whiteville Lumber Co., Goldsboro, N. C., to construct a bridge across the Waccamaw River, at or near Old Dock, county of Columbus, N. C.

On February 11, 1920:

H. R. 348. An act to add certain lands to the Ochoco National Forest, Oreg.;

H. R. 4382. An act to confer on the Court of Claims jurisdiction to determine the respective rights of and differences between the Fort Berthold Indians and the Government of the United States;

H. R. 8028. An act to add to the Oregon, Siuslaw, and Crater National Forests in Oregon certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. against the United States, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8598. An act restoring to Amy E. Hall her homestead rights and providing that on any homestead entry made by her she shall be given credit for all compliance with the law on her original homestead entry and for all payments made on same; and

H. R. 1761. An act for the relief of the Farmers' National Bank of Wilkinson, Ind.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, enforcement of the insecticide act: One executive officer, $2,750; 1 executive assistant, $2,000; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 4 clerks, class 1; 2 clerks, at $1,140 each; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 insecticide and fungicide inspectors, at $1,600 each; 2 clerks and sample collectors, at $1,000 each; 1 sample and storeroom custodian, $1,200; 1 laboratory helper, $840; 1 laboratory helper, $720; 1 laboratory helper, $600; 1 unskilled laborer, $600; 1 unskilled laborer, $480; 2 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 messenger boy, $360; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; in all, $30,350.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including and making a part of the same a letter to me from the commissioner of agriculture of the State of Virginia, relating to the reduction in the appropriation for various crop estimates now furnished by the Department of Agriculture. The commissioner is very apprehensive of the result of this reduction upon the prices of apples in my State. Virginia is the third largest apple-producing State in the United States. The relative standing of these three States in 1919 is as follows: Washington, 2,975,000 barrels; New York, 82,975,000 barrels; Virginia, 6,480,000 barrels. The commissioner is very apprehensive of the effect——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by including a letter from the commissioner of agriculture of his State relative to the Bureau of Crop Estimates. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND IMMIGRATION,
Richmond, February 9, 1920.

Hon. E. W. SAUNDERS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have been informed that the Agriculture Committee in the House, of which Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN is the chairman, I believe, proposes to reduce the appropriation to the Bureau of Crop Estimates, which will necessitate a discontinuance of the commercial crop report on apples and peaches to the fruit growers of the country.

This report is the only source of reliable information the farmers have been able to get to protect themselves against false reports circulated over the country at picking time. Every year buyers report heavy crops somewhere; that the market will be glutted, etc., and fruit growers sell below value on this account. I believe the service rendered by this report has saved the fruit grower on an average of $1 per barrel in the sale of his crop.

You can do nothing to help the fruit grower more in his work than to secure ample appropriation for this purpose, which I hope will meet with your approval.

With best wishes.

Very truly, yours,

G. W. KOINER,
Commissioner.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a communication I have received from Mr. Morton, who is president of the Order of Railway Agents of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a letter from Mr. Morton, president of the Railway Agents of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what it is about.

Mr. BLANTON. It is about the contentions that are being made before the President at this time.

Mr. NOLAN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. This is not a union matter. I guess the reason the objection was made was because the gentleman thought it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of August 20, 1912, as amended, entitled "An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests; to permit and regulate the movement of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes," $100,450.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice the bill increases the appropriation from $37,400, the amount in the current law, to $100,450. This is such a marked increase, when most of the items of the bill have been carried at a decrease, that I beg to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill the reason for it.

Mr. HAUGEN. As stated in the report, it is to develop a port inspection service for the purpose of cooperating with officials of the Customs Service and with State officials. The department is now enforcing 14 quarantines prohibiting or restricting the entry of foreign plants, fruits, and plant products. It is also enforcing seven orders restricting the entry of additional foreign products. These quarantines are being enforced in cooperation with the Customs Service. It is additional work, and upon the showing made by the department the committee thought that at least $100,450 should be reported. The estimate called for $145,450. So the amount carried here shows a cut of $45,000 under the estimates. It is very important work.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I would like to get the information which I presume the gentleman from Iowa or some other member of the committee has. It certainly is not in the report. At present all the nursery stock and florists' stock which is imported at all is imported in very restricted quantities, and has to be brought to the city of Washington for examination by the Federal Horicultural Board. Now, do I understand this appropriation will be sufficient to permit the establishment at the port of entry itself or at various ports of entry of a force which can examine the stock as it comes in there, instead of requiring them to bring it to Washington?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is what it is proposed to do with the increase. As stated in the report, that is in cooperation with the Customs Service.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is not very satisfactory information. Here is the present situation: Under the plant quarantine order, which prohibits the importation of nearly all plants, the importation of some plants in small quantities is allowed. That all now has to be brought to Washington and inspected here and passed on by the board of inspectors. Of course, frequently that involves practically a destruction of the property, because to bring it through the port of entry and bring it to Washington, and after it has been examined here send it on to some other place in the country, the time and trouble involved is considerable, and besides the damage to the stock is also very large. Now, I want to know if this item contemplates the establishment of an inspection service at some of the ports of entry?

Mr. HAUGEN. It has become apparent that the port inspection service of the department, already undertaken in a limited way, should be greatly strengthened, exactly as stated in the report. It is to strengthen and establish the port inspection service.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I intend to make a point of order against this whole section following; and in order to save time in reading two pages, why can not the point of order be made now?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is conceded that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. I make the point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the plant quarantine act, approved August 20, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 315), be, and is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following section:

"SEC. 15. That in order further to control and eradicate and to prevent the dissemination of dangerous plant diseases and insect infections and infestations no plant or plant products for or capable of propagation, including nursery stock, hereinafter referred to as plants and plant products, shall be moved or allowed to be moved, shipped, transported, or carried by any means whatever into or out of the District of Columbia, except in compliance with such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture as hereinafter provided. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture, after investigation, shall determine that any plants and plant products in the District of Columbia are infested or infected with insect pests and diseases and that any place, articles, and substances used or connected therewith are so infested or infected, written notice thereof shall be given by him to the owner or person in possession or control thereof, and such owner or person shall forthwith control or eradicate and prevent the dissemination of such insect pest or disease and shall remove, cut, or destroy such infested and infected plants, plant products, and articles and substances used or connected therewith which are hereby declared to be nuisances, within the time and in the manner required in said notice or by the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Whenever such owner or person can not be found, or shall fail, neglect, or refuse to comply with the foregoing provisions of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and required to control and eradicate and prevent dissemination of such insect pest or disease and to remove, cut, or destroy infested or infected plants and plant products and articles and substances used or connected therewith, and the United States shall have an action of debt against such owner or persons for expenses incurred by the Secretary of Agriculture in that behalf. Employees of the Federal Horticultural Board are hereby authorized and required to inspect places, plants, and plant products and articles and substances used or connected therewith whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that such inspections are necessary for the purposes of this section. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions and requirements of this section and of the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture made hereunder, and the notices given pursuant thereto, employees of the Federal Horticultural Board shall have power with a warrant to enter into or upon any place and open any bundle, package, or other container of plants or plant products whenever they shall have cause to believe that infections or infestations of plant pests and diseases exist therein or thereon, and when such infections or infestations are found to exist, after notice by the Secretary of Agriculture to the owner or person in possession or control thereof and an opportunity by said owner or person to be heard, to destroy the infected or infested plants or plant products contained therein. The police court or the municipal court of the District of Columbia shall have power, upon information supported by oath or affirmation showing probable cause for believing that there exists in any place, bundle, package, or other container in the District of Columbia any plant or plant product which is infected or infested with plant pests or disease, to issue warrants for the search for and seizure of all such plants and plant products. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is hereby required, from time to time, to make and promulgate such rules and regulations as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section, and any person who shall move or allow to be moved, or shall ship, transport, or carry, by any means whatever, any plant or plant products from or into the District of Columbia, except in compliance with the rules and regulations prescribed under this section, shall be punished, as is provided in section 10 of this act."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think we have read far enough on this to disclose the fact that it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will complete the reading of the paragraph. The Chair thinks that the paragraph should be read entire. It is somewhat different from an amendment offered on the floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

And not to exceed 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts for the miscellaneous expenses of the work of any bureau, division, or office herein provided for shall be available interchangeably for expenditures on the objects included within the general expenses of such bureau, division, or office, but no more than 10 per cent shall be added to any one item of appropriation except in cases of extraordinary emergency, and then only upon the written order of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS.

Demonstrations on reclamation projects: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage and aid in the agricultural development of the Government reclamation projects; to assist, through demonstrations, advice, and in other ways, settlers on the projects; and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $30,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to inquire, Mr. Chairman, about the item at the bottom of line 9, page 89. The aggregate amount carried is $135,750. On page 92, line 7, the total of the item is $169,050. It would therefore appear to be that something like $34,000 is carried in order to enforce the paragraph which has been stricken out. If that is correct, we certainly ought to reduce the appropriation by the amount of that $34,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is $33,300 carried under the heading of "Salaries, Federal Horticultural Board." That is in addition to $35,750 for general expenses. The salaries under the Federal Horticultural Board are not on the item for the general expenses. They are on the statutory roll.

Mr. TREADWAY. According to the copy of the bill I have, there is no item between this $135,000 item and the $169,050 item except the one paragraph stricken out.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. On page 88, lines 4 to 12, the gentleman will find in his copy of the bill a paragraph for salaries on the statutory roll. That is not counted under the head of "General expenses."

Mr. TREADWAY. Not in this item, on page 89?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No. It is not carried under the head of "General expenses."

Mr. TREADWAY. There is no actual appropriation for the paragraph that has been stricken out?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No. The paragraph stricken out was an amendment of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Experiments in dairying and live-stock production in semiarid and irrigated districts of the western United States: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct investigations and experiments in problems connected with the establishment of dairying and meat-production enterprises on the semiarid and irrigated lands of the western United States, including the purchase of live stock, and the employment of necessary persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $30,000.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, this provision is "to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct investigations and experiments in problems connected with the establishment of dairying and meat-production enterprises on the semiarid and irrigated lands of the Western States, including the purchase of live stock." In this connection the other day, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] called attention to that great hog which had been produced in his State, I reminded him of the fact that a remarkable product of that kind had been raised in my district in the State of Mississippi by Mr. Sim Orr. This has attracted some attention, and I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. James R. Joslyn, editor of the Empire News, at Geneva, N. Y., dated February 10, 1920, which is as follows:

GENEVA, N. Y., February 10, 1920.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Speaking of big hogs, Calvin A. Norton, of Groveland, Livingston County, N. Y., raised a hog that in the third year weighed over 1,400 pounds. His farm was next to that now owned and lived on by Senator WADSWORTH. I saw the hog repeatedly, and another remarkable thing about it was that it was the runt pig of the litter at first in its young life.

Very truly, yours, J. R. JOSLYN.

[Laughter.]

I commend the hog from Ohio and the one from Mississippi and this one from New York to you gentlemen from the Western States, and suggest that you might introduce these breeds of hogs into that country, and thus very greatly improve your meat product and increase it very much.

In this connection I wish to call attention to another product. I read:

THE FAME OF MISSISSIPPI CARRIED BY A POTATO.

Surely the fame of Mississippi is borne on the wings of many a sort of a messenger. Several weeks ago we printed a story of receiving a sweet potato from the Bank of Drew, Drew, Miss., weighing 13¾ pounds. This story has floated up and down the face of the earth, probably because we stated that the potato would feed one man a week, and such potatoes were a terrible blow to the high cost of living.

Now comes the China Press, printed in Shanghai, China, with a story of that famous potato on its editorial page.

The Commercial Appeal goes to Mr. C. D. Jordan, who is in Shanghai, and it is probable that Mr. Jordan showed the editor of the China Press that there were other great regions in the world and fertile valleys in the world outside of the Flowery Kingdom.

This item is a short editorial taken from the Commercial Appeal, the great daily newspaper of Memphis, Tenn., of which Hon. C. P. J. Mooney is the very able, versatile, and brilliant editor.

Now, if these arid and semiarid lands in the West will be utilized for the production of such hogs as are herein described and for the production of this variety of potato, it certainly would bring about great results, amply justifying the appropriation made in this provision of our bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes, sir; with great pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I add to the statement that the gentleman has made about the primacy of Mississippi in respect to the production of swine the figures given by the Agricultural Department of January 1, showing the progress of swine raising in Mississippi?

Mr. CANDLER. Certainly. I will be very glad to hear them.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. This illustrates what is going on in Mississippi as well as the entire South. I read:

Statement of the estimate of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, showing the statistics with respect to hogs in the States mentioned, as of Jan. 1, of the years shown.

	1911	1915	1920
North Carolina	1,351,000	1,525,000	1,592,000
South Carolina	745,000	819,000	1,088,000
Georgia	1,873,000	2,042,000	3,165,000
Florida	867,000	949,000	1,588,000
Tennessee	1,499,000	1,501,000	1,946,000
Alabama	1,419,000	1,559,000	2,201,000
Mississippi	1,421,000	1,540,000	2,396,000
Texas	2,570,000	2,880,000	2,356,000
Total	11,745,000	12,815,000	16,332,000

Mr. CANDLER. I am very much gratified to have that report as to the progress of Mississippi in raising great hogs, and it is certainly very encouraging as to the whole South. May the good work go on to the great prosperity of our splendid farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What you raise is soft pork, and it is worth several cents a pound less, and that is because you will not get good stock.

Mr. CANDLER. We have a great deal of good stock and are getting more and more every year. The gentleman from Illinois is badly mistaken in suggesting that all we raise is soft pork. We produce a lot of high-class, splendid meat, and we have lots of most excellent thoroughbred registered stock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eradication of foot-and-mouth and other contagious diseases of animals: In case of an emergency arising out of the existence of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, threatens the live-stock industry of the country, he may expend in the city of Washington or elsewhere, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, which sum is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as he determines to be necessary, in the arrest and eradication of any such disease, including the payment of claims growing out of past and future purchases and destruction, in cooperation with the States, of animals affected by or exposed to, or of materials contaminated by or exposed to, any such disease, wherever found and irrespective of ownership, under like or substantially similar circumstance, when such owner has complied with all lawful quarantine regulations: Provided, That the payment for animals hereafter purchased may be made on appraisement based on the meat, dairy, or breeding value, but in case of appraisement based on breeding value no appraisement of any animal shall exceed three times its meat or dairy value, and except in case of an extraordinary emergency, to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, the payment by the United States Government for any animal shall not exceed one-half of any such appraisements: Provided further, That so much of the appropriation of $2,500,000 made by the Agricultural appropriation act of March 4, 1915, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, for the arrest and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals, as remains unexpended at the close of the fiscal year 1920, is hereby reappropriated and made available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, for the objects mentioned in said appropriation act, including necessary investigations to determine whether said diseases have been completely eradicated in districts where they previously existed.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH: Page 95, line 4, after the word "animals," insert the following: "including the blowfly and screw worm in live stock and poultry."

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman estimate the amount that will be required for the work proposed?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am not seeking to increase the appropriation at all, but just including these words in the appropriation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Would the gentleman suggest a limit on the amount to be expended for this purpose?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will let the chairman place that limitation. I will say that the Secretary of Agriculture can expend a portion of this sum for this purpose if these words are inserted, but it does not increase the amount.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman wishes to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary? If so, I have no objection to that.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture agrees to the amendment, and therefore I will not take the time of the committee any further in discussing it.

Mr. PURNELL. I will ask the chairman of the committee if the word "materials," in line 16, page 95, should be "animals"?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; it refers to contaminated materials.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman thinks that word is all right?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. "Materials" is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To prevent the movement of cotton and cotton seed from Mexico into the United States, including the regulation of the entry into the United States of railway cars and other vehicles, and freight, express, baggage, or other materials from Mexico, and the inspection, cleaning, and disinfection thereof, $148,560; any moneys received in payment of charges fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture on account of such cleaning and disinfection at plants constructed therefor out of any appropriation made on account of the pink bollworm of cotton to be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all the language from line 4, beginning with the semicolon, the remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG of Texas: Page 97, line 4, after the semicolon, strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not really mean to insist on the motion to strike out, but I do take advantage of that motion to raise this question: The pink boll worm crossed into our country from Mexico. It is a very threatening insect to the whole cotton industry. The Government has made rapid strides toward its destruction, but in trying to destroy this insect it has adopted the disinfection of all cars and of all commerce coming out of Mexico through Texas into the other parts of the United States. One of the regulations made by the Department of Agriculture is to charge all commerce, whether shoes or lumber, or commerce of any kind, with the expense of this disinfectant. Every car that comes out of Mexico is disinfected, and that commerce is charged up with the incidental expense. My judgment is that this remedy is proper, that these cars should be disinfected, but although I do not know what to suggest as a remedy, I raise the question that it is unfair to commerce not related to the cotton industry, not related in any way to the pink boll worm, that this commerce shall be charged with the expenses of this disinfection. If that policy were generally pursued, then the Government could go to Galveston, New Orleans, San Francisco, New York, or any port where we are bringing in nursery stock or any kind of plant life that is liable to be infected with some insect, and could say that in order to see to it that none of these insects are brought into our country the Government will make all commerce passing through these ports stand disinfection charges. I do not think that is a correct practice. I do not know how it can be worked out, but I take advantage of this opportunity to suggest that it is a burden that general commerce ought not to be forced to stand.

Mr. LAYTON. What would you do with the money collected?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The point I make is this: If I were shipping cotton seed or cotton out of Mexico, which might be infected with this insect—which no one is allowed to do—then a shipper bringing that cotton across the line ought to be forced to stand the charges of disinfection; but if I were bringing shoes out of Mexico by the carload, if such a thing should happen, I as a shipper ought not to be forced to stand a charge against that kind of commerce when we are trying to destroy an insect that comes in with cotton.

Mr. LAYTON. Still I ask, What would you do with the money collected?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I withdraw my amendment. I simply wished to raise the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. If there be no objection, he will be allowed to do so.

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a few remarks. We are just closing the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and I am one of those who believe that we ought to pay a few compliments to those who deserve them before they pass away; that we ought not to keep back all the flowers until after they are gone.

First, I want to compliment the gentleman who has presided over this committee [Mr. WALSH]. [Applause.] I want to say that he has made a most excellent Chairman, and that he has given careful consideration to every point of order and has rendered his decisions just as he conscientiously believed they should be rendered. He has been eminently fair and courteous to the membership upon both sides. I do not think we have had a better Chairman of any committee during this Congress than the gentleman who now presides over the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. [Applause.]

I am not going to compliment the committee, because I happen to be a member of it, and I will let somebody else do that; but I want to say this, that the Committee on Agriculture during the last six weeks or nearly two months has done as much work as any Committee on Agriculture with which I have been connected. We have done a great deal of hard, digging work, and the committee, regardless of the estimate that may be put upon the result of its labors by the membership of the House, deserves to be complimented upon its industry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say something about the Department of Agriculture. We have had some criticism of that department, but after an experience of something like eight or nine years connected with this committee, and after coming in contact with the gentlemen in the Department of Agriculture, I believe that I am in a position to pass judgment, and I know that those gentlemen are doing splendid work, and that they ought to come in for a share of my compliments this afternoon.

I hold in my hand some statements giving brief character sketches of all of the heads of the various departments. These were furnished me at my own request and for my own information from the Secretary's office.

Let me say to you that there are men in the department who have been there a long time. I shall not mention names. One has been there since 1878. Several have been in the department 25 or 30 years. I could go through the list and tell you how long each of the chiefs of the departments has been there. As I said, one has been there since 1878, another since 1884, one since 1888, one since 1889, two since 1891, one since 1894, and two since 1897. They are there, my friends, because they love the work and not because of the salaries they get. These gentlemen are doing a great work for the advancement of agriculture and they should be encouraged and commended.

I want to call attention to another thing in that connection. Since last June a year ago, within the period of 18 months, 60 men, prominent in the Department of Agriculture, high salaried men, have left the department and gone into other fields of labor because the Government did not pay them enough money to enable them to stay there. The department is a great training school for the universities and for the big business industries of the country.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Certainly.

Mr. JACOWAY. Does not the testimony show that a large number of men have been offered higher salaries than they are getting from the Government but refused to leave?

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman states a fact. One gentleman receiving less than $4,000 had an offer of $7,500 just a few days ago, and the only reason he did not accept it was because he was attached to the department, liked the work, and felt that he ought to stay there.

Now, I want to take up as an illustration the Bureau of Markets, one of the newest bureaus in the Department of Agriculture. In less than 18 months 14 of these employees have left who were drawing from the Treasury of the United States $41,400 a year. They are now receiving $101,500 a year. The combined salaries of the 14 men are $60,000 greater than the sums they were receiving from the Department of Agriculture. I mention this to show you the high class of men that are connected with our great Department of Agriculture. These gentlemen should receive the commendation of the Congress and the country. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I most heartily agree with everything said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] as to the distinguished gentleman [Mr. WALSH] who has so ably presided during the consideration of this bill, and also in what he has said in reference to the work done by the Agriculture Committee, as well as the splendid work done by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if we are going to have these eulogistic speeches, we ought to have somebody here to hear them. I think we ought to have a quorum—that is, if there are to be many more of these speeches.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman from Texas takes up a great deal of time——

Mr. BLANTON. I represent 300,000 people.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman is entitled to as much time as I am and as much more as the House sees fit to give him.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman does not want an audience, I will withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman from Texas takes up so much time and then objects to anybody else taking up time. The gentleman suggests that I do not want an audience. I have a great audience, a most delightful audience, a very large audience, and a very intelligent audience. [Applause.]

The Department of Agriculture, as was suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, is doing a very remarkable work. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], a few days ago, referred to the Secretary who had recently retired and had been transferred to the Department of the Treasury. When I came to Congress the Secretary of Agriculture was the Hon. James Wilson, from the State of Iowa. [Applause.] He served longer than any other man as Secretary of Agriculture, and I believe longer than any other man in a Cabinet position. He had the work of this great department at heart, and there never has been, nor will there be in the future, a greater Secretary of Agriculture than the Hon. James Wilson.

The gentleman who succeeded him as Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. D. F. Houston, made a great record and measured up to the highest standard, as I think all will bear testimony. His record has been such as to commend him to the country and to the President of the United States to such an extent that the President promoted him to be Secretary of the Treasury, and I now confidently predict he will make a great Secretary of the Treasury. [Applause.]

Now comes another Secretary, Hon. Edwin T. Meredith. I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with him, and he has not been here long enough for us to make an accurate estimate of his ability or work as Secretary of Agriculture. He comes, however, from the same State as the Hon. James Wilson, who served so long, and from the same State as the distinguished chairman of the Agricultural Committee [Mr. HAUGEN], and I feel confident in assuring the House and the country that we have another great Secretary of Agriculture. [Applause.]

I called attention a few days ago to his first public utterance. It had the right ring to it, and showed a proper knowledge and conception of the situation and conditions existing in the country, and clearly indicated he was devoted to accomplishing results which would be of great benefit to the people at large.

There is no greater work than that connected with the Department of Agriculture and none of greater benefit to the people of the United States of America. The chiefs of the divisions and bureaus and the employees in the department deserve and should receive our best consideration. They are patriotic, faithful, and efficient, and many of them are willing to remain there, and do remain there, at a loss to themselves financially, as has been demonstrated many times, in order to serve their country. In our committee work there is one gentleman who always renders us very great assistance, and I think deserves special mention, and that is Mr. F. R. Harrison, assistant to the Secretary. [Applause.] He has a thorough knowledge of the department and of every detail of its work and activities. His cooperation with us and assistance to us each year in the preparation of the Agricultural appropriation bill and in furnishing information in reference thereto is of incalculable benefit. The Committee on Agriculture is one of the very greatest committees in the House, as everybody knows. Every Member on it is a splendid fellow, especially our chairman; and the committee does honest, faithful, and efficient work, and as a result always presents you a well-considered bill. We appreciate your cooperation, my fellow Members, in aiding us to pass this one, and we solicit your continued cooperation in the future, and all together we will render the country a great service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend these remarks and those previously made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks and those previously made. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia and Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan had leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Investigation and prevention of plant-dust explosions and fires: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with State officials, farmers, operators of cotton gins, grain mills and elevators, and other warehouses, manufacturers and operators of farm machinery, in investigating causes of and in developing and putting into general practice methods for protection against grain dust, smut dust, or other plant-dust explosions and resulting fires, including fires in cotton gins and oil mills; to devise and demonstrate methods for destroying or preventing the wide dissemination of smut spores; and to study the problems of cleaning and handling grain in thrashing machines, grain mills, and elevators, $25,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph. It is new legislation and has no place in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. Nothing more than to refer again to what has been so often referred to before—the organic law establishing the Department of Agriculture. It is pretty broad, and it appears to me that it would include this activity. It affects the farms and the elevators and the mills where the wheat is ground and the thrashing machines and various other activities. It is doing a very excellent work. The loss by fire has been very great.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he has read the testimony on this item?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; I have. And, furthermore, I would state that it is nothing but a duplication of work already done by insurance companies all over the country. There is no place for this item on this bill.

Mr. JACOWAY. The testimony shows that $3,000,000 worth of thrashing machines alone were saved by this item of $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order to the paragraph. The paragraph is to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with State officials in investigating causes and developing and putting into practice methods of protection against grain-dust explosions, and so forth. The Chair does not think this comes within the organic law establishing the Department of Agriculture. There is no authority there for cooperation for particular purposes with the States, and this seems to be beyond the scope of the act, although the act is very broad and general in its terms, as the Chair has heretofore stated. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 99, after line 2, insert as a new paragraph:

"That during the Sixty-sixth Congress the members of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, not less than five in number, are hereby authorized and empowered to conduct hearings and examine into the conduct and management of the Bureau of the Forest Service and other bureaus, branches, and agencies of the Department of Agriculture, at Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and shall have and are hereby granted authority to subpœna witnesses, compel their attendance, administer oaths, and to demand and examine all books, documents, and papers relating to the business of such bureaus and their branches and agencies; and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated for expenses incident thereto.

"Said committee is hereby authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance, including stenographers, as the members of said committee may deem necessary in the proper prosecution of its work."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I think we ought to get along and get through with this bill. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arizona desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. HAYDEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter, if any employee of the Department of Agriculture assigned to permanent duty in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands shall elect to postpone taking any or all of the annual leave to which he may be entitled, he may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, subject to the interests of the public service, be allowed to take at one time in any calendar year unused annual leave which may have accumulated within not to exceed four calendar years immediately preceding and be paid at the rates prevailing during the year such leave has accumulated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard?

Mr. HAUGEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the last paragraph in the bill purports to give the total appropriation carried by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the clerks have been authorized to correct the totals. The Chair would state that there are paragraphs on pages 9 and 25 which were passed over with the privilege of returning to them later.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, after line 17, insert: "For the maintenance of stations for observing, measuring, and investigating atmospheric phenomena, including salaries, travel, and other expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $81,020."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation and is not authorized by law; that it introduces a new subject and is not germane to the preceding paragraph.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph went out on a point of order last Friday. Permission was granted to return to it. I am now offering the paragraph with the language to which the point of order was directed omitted, so as not to cripple the service. The appropriation of $81,020 carried in my amendment is the amount recommended by the committee and carried in the paragraph that went out on a point of order a week ago to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. The Chair would state that this amendment contains certain language of the paragraph which was formerly stricken out on a point of order. Clearly the language which has been omitted from the paragraph was subject to the point of order, and in the view of the Chair the language that has been retained for the maintenance of stations, for measuring and observing atmospheric phenomena, and so forth, including salaries, comes within the scope of the act of August 1, 1890 (26 Stat., 653), and the resolution of July 8, 1898 (30 Stat., 752), which established the Weather Bureau and defined the scope of its duties in forecasting the weather, investigating weather conditions, establishing weather stations, and in the distribution of information and the employment of a chief and other employees and fixing their salaries. The Chair therefore——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this particular amendment now offered in order to be proof against the point of order must be germane to the paragraph immediately preceding it in the bill. It is not germane to that paragraph. I submit to the Chair that it is not as if it appeared in the bill originally coming from the Committee on Agriculture, but this is an amendment offered from the floor by a member of the committee and has no more force and standing than if it were offered by any other Member of the House. It does introduce a new subject, and under the ruling of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] on the subject of germaneness, when he occupied the chair as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I submit that this amendment is not germane to the paragraph immediately preceding by reason of the fact that it introduces a new subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that he has the very highest respect for the rulings of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, to whom the gentleman from Texas has referred.

Mr. BLANTON. His ruling was based upon a ruling of Mr. Speaker Carlisle.

The CHAIRMAN. And also the ruling of the Speaker to which the gentleman from Texas refers, and for the reasons already stated the Chair believes this amendment comes within the rules, and therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report, returning to a portion of the bill that has been passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 25, line 9, after the word "production," strike out the figures "359,705" and insert in lieu thereof "212,505."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. RUBEY. There have been a good many requests on this side of the House that we get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on this bill to-morrow; and inasmuch as several votes will be taken—it is now late in the evening—will that be agreeable to the gentleman? There will probably be two or three roll calls. It does not make any difference to me.

Mr. HAUGEN. I see no objection to that.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12272, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 396. An act to authorize the payment of certain amounts for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota;

H. R. 5665. An act for the relief of Carlow Avellina;

H. R. 683. An act for the relief of William E. Johnson; and

H. R. 3620. An act to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to change the names of vessels.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAUGEN. In view of the agreement, if there is no other business before the House, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, February 14, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the War Department for expenses of arsenals, fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 648); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting annual report of the Director of Air Service (H. Doc. No. 465); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting abstracts of proposals received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, for material and labor in connection with works under the Engineer Department; to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

4. A letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting volume 1 of the text of the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 480); to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12486) authorizing the several district courts of the United States to appoint official stenographers and prescribing their duties and compensation, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 628), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LANGLEY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11175) for the public sale of customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 631), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. Miller, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3610) for the relief of William S. Britton, formerly second lieutenant of Infantry, who has been erroneously dropped from the rolls of the United States Army, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 629), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2807) to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 630), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. O'CONNELL: A bill (H. R. 12501) granting holidays to postal employees in States where holidays are a State law; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

By Mr. MOON: A bill (H. R. 12502) providing for a report on the cost of improving and maintaining the Government boulevard on Missionary Ridge, in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 12503) making an appropriation to construct a telephone line on the Papago Indian Reservation, Ariz.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1531. By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of 39 citizens of the United States, favoring an investigation of the report of the Shipping Board's plan to sell the German ships now in possession of the United States Government; to the special committee to investigate the Shipping Board's operations.

1532. Also (by request), petition of Joseph Edward Penn, Springfield, Mass., and Edward S. Gibson, New York, N. Y., favoring an investigation of the report of the Shipping Board's plan to sell the German ships now in possession of the United States Government; to the special committee to investigate the Shipping Board's operations.

1533. By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of W. J. Jones and others, of Newark, Ohio, favoring the Lehlbach-Sterling bill, etc.; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

1534. By Mr. CAREW: Petition of the United Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West, of San Francisco, Calif., relative to certain legislation, etc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1535. Also, petition of the Jamaica Board of Trade, opposing the Esch-Cummins railroad bills, etc.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1536. By Mr. COLE: Petition of Lemert Grange, No. 1901, Sycamore, Ohio, urging the passage of the truth in fabrics bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

1537. By Mr. JOHNSTON of New York: Petition of the Jamaica Board of Trade, opposing the Esch-Cummins railroad bill, and also requesting an investigation of the Long Island Railroad, etc.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1538. By Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa: Petition of sundry citizens of Burlington, Des Moines County, Iowa, favoring the passage of Senate bill 1699 and House bill 3149, the Lehlbach-Sterling bills; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 14, 1920.

(Legislative day of Friday, February 13, 1920.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRONNA obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senator from Utah will not raise the question of a quorum, because I simply want to make a few observations on the question of retirement, but not particularly on this bill. I think it would take considerable time to get a quorum. However, if the Senator insists upon it, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	McNary	Simmons
Ball	Harrison	Moses	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sutherland
Capper	Kellogg	Overman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Owen	Townsend
Colt	Keyes	Page	Trammell
Culberson	King	Phipps	Underwood
Cummins	Kirby	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Dillingham	Lodge	Ransdell	Warren
Elkins	McCormick	Robinson	Watson
Fletcher	McCumber	Sheppard
Gronna	McKellar	Sherman

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] on business of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are detained by illness in their families.

The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] are absent on account of illness.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are absent on public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

RESIGNATION OF SECRETARY OF STATE LANSING.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask what is the parliamentary situation? Is it understood that I have the floor? I was recognized by the Chair before the call for a quorum was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the letters exchanged between the President and the Secretary of State may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY LANSING, REBUKED BY PRESIDENT, RESIGNS—FULL TEXT OF LETTERS LEADING TO RESIGNATION OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 7 February, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Is it true, as I have been told, that during my illness you have frequently called the heads of the executive departments of the Government into conference? If it is, I feel it my duty to call your attention to considerations which I do not care to dwell upon until I learn from you yourself that this is the fact. Under our constitutional law and practice, as developed hitherto, no one but the President has the right to summon the heads of the executive departments into conference, and no one but the President and the Congress has the right to ask their views or the views of any one of them on any public question.

I take this matter up with you because in the development of every constitutional system, custom and precedent are of the most serious consequence, and I think we will all agree in desiring not to lead in any wrong direction. I have therefore taken the liberty of writing you to ask you this question, and I am sure you will be glad to answer.

I am happy to learn from your recent note to Mrs. Wilson that your strength is returning.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HON. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

"THOUGHT CONFERENCES WISE"; OFFERS TO RESIGN.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, February 9, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is true that frequently during your illness I requested the heads of the executive departments of the Government to meet for informal conference.

Shortly after you were taken ill in October certain members of the Cabinet, of which I was one, felt that in view of the fact that we were denied communication with you it was wise for us to confer informally together on interdepartmental matters and matters as to which action could not be postponed until your medical advisers permitted you to pass upon them.

Accordingly I, as the ranking member, requested the members of the Cabinet to assemble for such informal conference; and in view of the mutual benefit derived the practice was continued. I can assure you that it never for a moment entered my mind that I was acting unconstitutionally or contrary to your wishes, and there certainly was no intention on my part to assume powers and exercise functions which under the Constitution are exclusively confided to the President.

During these troublous times, when many difficult and vexatious questions have arisen and when in the circumstances I have been deprived of your guidance and direction, it has been my constant endeavor to carry out your policies as I understood them and to act in all matters as I believed you would wish me to act.

If, however, you think that I have failed in my loyalty to you and if you no longer have confidence in me and prefer to have another conduct our foreign affairs, I am, of course, ready, Mr. President, to relieve you of any embarrassment by placing my resignation in your hands.

I am, as always,

Faithfully, yours, ROBERT LANSING.

"TRIED TO FORESTALL MY JUDGMENT"; ACCEPTS.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 11, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am very much disappointed by your letter of February 9 in reply to mine asking about the so-called Cabinet meetings. You kindly explain the motives of these meetings, and I find nothing in your letter which justifies your assumption of presidential authority in such a matter. You say you "felt that, in view of the fact that you were denied communication with me, it was wise to confer informally together on interdepartmental matters and matters as to which action could not be postponed until my medical advisers permitted me" to be seen and consulted, but I have to remind you, Mr. Secretary, that no action could be taken without me by the Cabinet, and therefore there could have been no disadvantage in awaiting action with regard to matters concerning which action could not have been taken without me.

This affair, Mr. Secretary, only deepens a feeling that was growing upon me. While we were still in Paris I felt, and have felt increasingly ever since, that you accepted my guidance and direction on questions with regard to which I had to instruct you only with increasing reluctance, and since my return to Washington I have been struck by the number of matters in which you have apparently tried to forestall my judgment by formulating action and merely asking my approval when it was impossible for me to form an independent judgment, because I had not had an opportunity to examine the circumstances with any degree of independence.

I therefore feel that I must frankly take advantage of your kind suggestion that if I should prefer to have another to conduct our foreign affairs you are ready to relieve me of any embarrassment by placing your resignation in my hands, for I must say that it would relieve me of embarrassment, Mr. Secretary, the embarrassment of feeling your reluctance and divergence of judgment, if you would give your present office up and afford me an opportunity to select some one whose mind would more willingly go along with mine.

I need not tell you with what reluctance I take advantage of your suggestion, or that I do so with the kindliest feeling. In matters of transcendent importance like this the only wise course is a course of perfect candor, where personal feeling is as much as possible left out of the reckoning.

Very sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HON. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

SAYS HE HAD CONTEMPLATED RESIGNING A YEAR AGO.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, February 12, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I wish to thank you sincerely for your candid letter of the 11th, in which you state that my resignation would be acceptable to you, since it relieves me of the responsibility for action which I have been contemplating and which I can now take without hesitation, as it meets your wishes.

I have the honor, therefore, to tender you my resignation as Secretary of State, the same to take effect at your convenience.

In thus severing our official association I feel, Mr. President, that I should make the following statement, which I had prepared recently and which will show you that I have not been unmindful that the continuance of our present relations was impossible and that I realized that it was clearly my duty to bring them to an end at the earliest moment compatible with the public interest.

Ever since January, 1919, I have been conscious of the fact that you no longer were disposed to welcome my advice in matters pertaining to the negotiations in Paris, to our foreign service, or to international affairs in general.

Holding these views, I would, if I had consulted my personal inclination alone, have resigned as Secretary of State and as a commissioner to negotiate peace. I felt, however, that such a step might have been misinterpreted, both at home and abroad, and that it was my duty to cause you no embarrassment in carrying forward the great task in which you were then engaged.

Possibly I erred in this, but if I did it was with the best of motives.

When I returned to Washington in the latter part of July, 1919, my personal wish to resign had not changed, but again I felt that loyalty to you and my duty to the administration compelled me to defer action as my resignation might have been misconstrued into hostility to the ratification of the treaty of peace or, at least, into disapproval of your views as to the form of ratification. I therefore remained silent, avoiding any comment on the frequent reports that we were not in full agreement. Subsequently, your serious illness, during which I have never seen you, imposed upon me the duty—at least, I construed it to be my duty—to remain in charge of the Department of State until your health permitted you to assume again full direction of foreign affairs.

Believing that that time had arrived, I had prepared my resignation when my only doubt as to the propriety of placing it in your hands was removed by your letter indicating that it would be entirely acceptable to you.

I think, Mr. President, in accordance with the frankness which has marked this correspondence and for which I am grateful to you, that I can not permit to pass unchallenged the imputation that in calling into informal conference the heads of the executive departments I sought to usurp your presidential authority. I had no such intention, no such thought.

I believed then and I believe now that the conferences which were held were for the best interests of your administration and of the Republic, and that belief was shared by others whom I consulted. I further believe that the conferences were proper and necessary in the circumstances, and that I would have been derelict in my duty if I had failed to act as I did.

I also feel, Mr. President, that candor compels me to say that I can not agree with your statement that I have tried to forestall your judgment in certain cases by formulating action and merely asking your approval when it was impossible for you to form an independent judgment because you had not had an opportunity to examine the circumstances with any degree of independence. I have, it is true, when I thought a case demanded immediate action, advised you what, in my opinion, that action should be, stating at the same time the reasons on which my opinion was based.

This I conceived to be a function of the Secretary of State, and I have followed the practice for the past four years and a half. I confess that I have been surprised and disappointed at the frequent disapproval of my suggestions, but I have never failed to follow your decisions, however difficult it made the conduct of our foreign affairs.

I need hardly add that I leave the office of Secretary of State with only good will toward you, Mr. President, and with a sense of profound relief.

Forgetting our differences and remembering only your many kindnesses in the past, I have the honor to be, Mr. President,

Sincerely, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

"ACKNOWLEDGED WITH APPRECIATION," TO TAKE EFFECT AT ONCE.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 13, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Allow me to acknowledge with appreciation your letter of February 12. It now being evident, Mr. Secretary, that we have both of us felt the embarrassment of our recent relations with each other, I feel it my duty to accept your resignation, to take effect at once, at the same time adding that I hope that the future holds for you many successes of the most gratifying sort. My best wishes will always follow you, and it will be a matter of gratification to me always to remember our delightful personal relations.

Sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HON. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a short time to speak upon a matter which perhaps has nothing to do with the bill which is now the unfinished business, but it does have something to do with the question of retirement. However, instead of affecting thousands of employees the subject to which I intend to address myself affects the retirement of only two very prominent and distinguished gentlemen in the United States.

On February 3 I introduced a bill (S. 3844) to provide for discontinuing the purchase and sale of grain by the Government, and for other purposes.

The act of August 10, 1917, contains a provision fixing a minimum guaranteed price of wheat of not less than $2 per bushel, based upon a grade of No. 1 Northern. It also authorizes the President to fix a higher price if in his judgment it would be necessary to stimulate the production of wheat. This is section 14 of the food act.

I wish to call attention to the fact that there has never been a day or an hour, since the enactment of this law, that wheat has not been worth in the markets throughout the country more than the guaranteed or the fixed price. Of course, during the war the food controller and the grain director kept wheat down to the minimum price. During the first part of the year 1919 the prices of wheat in the terminal markets were kept down very close to the minimum price by the grain director, but a little later on the prices began to increase, so that on or about the 1st day of November the top price for No. 1 hard wheat was about $2.90 in the Minneapolis market. During the months of November and December the price increased, so that at one time No. 1 hard wheat sold as high as $3.55 per bushel.

I am making this statement for the purpose of showing that the way the law has been administered it has been of no benefit to the farmer.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has received a great many complaints with reference to the administration of this law, and the writers suggested that the Grain Corporation should be abolished. No one could find any fault with the law guaranteeing a minimum price of $2 to the producers of wheat, because it also gave the President power to make a higher price, but it is true that on the very day that the food law went into effect wheat sold in the western markets at about $3.10 per bushel, and shortly before this time it had sold as high as $3.35 per bushel.

The farmers throughout the country believe that this law was enacted for the purpose of controlling the price of wheat and to prevent it from reaching an abnormally high price. But the farmers submitted to it during the war; they did not complain. As long as they were able to they were willing to produce wheat even at a loss, but when the armistice was signed and the war was over the farmers felt that the prices of their products should not be controlled and arbitrarily reduced when, as a matter of fact, everything they had to buy was commanding a greatly increased price. Just before the war the farmer could buy a self-binder, standard size, for about $140. It advanced to $250, and farm machinery of all kinds advanced proportionately.

I believe I am safe in stating that it is the general belief among farmers that they suffered a loss of at least $1 per bushel on the price of wheat.

The Department of Agriculture estimated that the wheat crop of 1919 was approximately 918,000,000 bushels. It is always safe to figure a shrinkage of at least 5 per cent, which would mean a reduction of nearly 46,000,000 bushels, leaving a net amount of 872,000,000 bushels. It is estimated by the Department of Agriculture that in normal times we use about 5½ bushels per capita annually, so that if we figure a population of 110,000,000 we use for bread approximately 600,000,000 bushels. We use approximately 90,000,000 bushels for seed, leaving a net amount for export of less than 200,000,000 bushels. If I read correctly the statement of the United States Grain Corporation, our export on December 30 amounted to about 120,000,000 bushels, leaving a surplus of between 50,000,000 and 60,000,000 bushels which we have for sale and export.

I have here a statement furnished me by the Department of Agriculture indicating that wheat stocks on January 23, 1920, as reported by the United States Grain Corporation, were as I shall state. This report, which was made January 23, 1920, bears the following statement:

As reported by the United States Grain Corporation.

I am mentioning this, Mr. President, because it seems that a statement made by anyone outside of the Grain Corporation is at once attacked as inaccurate and wrong.

The Grain Corporation reports that there was in the country elevators a stock of 82,382,000 bushels; mill-elevator stock, 69,133,000 bushels; terminal-elevator stock, 65,633,000 bushels, making a total of 217,148,000 bushels in store.

Mr. President, of the crop of 1918 there was a carry over not to exceed 20,000,000 bushels. That was, perhaps, the smallest amount ever carried over in this country for years, as ordinarily it is necessary to have a carry over of from fifty to seventy-five million bushels. Even during the time we were at war, when the bins of the farmers were scraped to the bottom, there still were 20,000,000 bushels on the farms. Anyone who knows anything about farming must admit that it would be not only impossible but dangerous to sell every bushel of grain that is on the farm. We had at the time to which I have referred 20,000,000 bushels on the farms.

The Grain Corporation, which insists that it never makes any mistakes, gives the crop of 1919 as being 941,000,000 bushels. I know of no other agency of the Government that gives the amount any higher than 918,000,000 bushels. So there is a discrepancy of 23,000,000 bushels there.

But the Grain Corporation also gives the total supply, beginning with the year 1919, as being 961,000,000 bushels. The net movement from the farms from July 1 to January 23, according to the figures of the Grain Corporation, was 676,000,000 bushels. That includes about 57,000,000 bushels which has already been seeded to winter wheat. According to this report, there would remain on the farms 228,000,000 bushels.

I am going to show from Mr. Barnes's own testimony, which was given before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on the 25th day of October, that it is always safe to estimate a shrinkage of 5 per cent of the grain estimates. I agree with him on that. I believe that in a year such as 1919, when there was such a large amount of light wheat, it is safe to estimate a larger shrinkage than 5 per cent. That would mean a reduction in the total of 46,000,000 bushels, and plus the 23,000,000 bushels as reported by the Grain Corporation—which, according to the statistics of the Agricultural Department can not be correct—would make a total of 69,000,000 bushels. Deducting that from the 228,000,000 bushels, there would be on the farms 159,000,000 bushels. But, Mr. President, 30,000,000 bushels of that grain must be used for seed for the spring wheat crop, leaving a balance of 129,000,000 bushels. Then, deducting the average for a number of years of from 50,000,000 to 75,000,000 bushels held on the farms as a carry over, the average of which would be about 62,000,000 or 63,000,000 bushels, there would be an amount remaining on the farms of between 50,000,000 and 60,000,000 bushels, and not 228,000,000 bushels, as reported by Mr. Barnes.

Mr. President, I have avoided getting into any personal controversy with Mr. Barnes, and I desire it now understood that I am not attacking Mr. Barnes personally, but his constant reports and the extensive propaganda which he is now carrying on, and which he has been carrying on for at least two or three weeks, compels me to give what information I have in reference to this matter, and I honestly believe it is correct, and I think that I can see in this propaganda the possibility of dangerous results. The figures I have given to you, Senators, are absolutely correct; they are as nearly correct as the estimate can be made. There is no such amount of wheat left on the farms as Mr. Barnes indicates and as he states in the report which he is sending broadcast throughout the country and which is costing the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator show me the report of the amount of wheat which has been sent out by Mr. Barnes? I should like to see it.

Mr. GRONNA. I have only the short report from which I have read, but I will give it to the Senator.

Mr. President, I can not possibly have any other interest in this matter than that of the public welfare, but even as a farmer I do not desire to see the price of wheat go too high at this time. I do not wish to see a speculative price fixed on it. I do not wish to make it possible for the men who are always so ready to take advantage of such a situation as now exists to buy up the food products of our country for the purpose of speculation and in order to enhance the price to the consumer. I do not wish to see that done, in the first place, because it would be a detriment to the consumer and also to the farmer or the producer.

Mr. President, only this morning I read in Barnes's and Hoover's paper in the city of Washington—the Washington Herald—a statement of which I shall only give the substance. However, it was an attack upon statements made by me as to the difference it would make in the cost of a loaf of bread if the farmer should give his wheat to the miller free of charge. No one knows better than does Mr. Barnes that he was not stating the truth in that article. I was dealing with the price which the farmer received; I was not dealing with the price of the speculator. I am not denying that the average price of the speculator is $2.32; but I do most emphatically deny that that is the price which the farmer has received; and I can prove that it is an incorrect statement. The farmers throughout the United States received no such price as $2.32 a bushel for wheat. I will say to the Senate that, depending on quality, the average price for which farmers sold their wheat in the fall of last year was less than $2 a bushel.

Mr. GORE. I saw an estimate the other day that it was about $1.75.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Oklahoma states that he saw an estimate the other day that the average price was $1.75.

Mr. President, I have not attacked Mr. Barnes. I do not regard him as a Government official any longer, because I have discovered he is not operating under the Federal laws, but is operating under the laws of the State of Delaware. I find no fault with that; but I understand that the laws of the State of Delaware are very liberal so far as they relate to corporations.

I have here before me the certificate of incorporation of the Food Administration Grain Corporation, which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD so that there may be no mistake about it. I also ask that the formal contracts which Mr. Barnes is making, or which he has made, with bakers, wheat-flour millers, with dealers, elevators, and brokers, with the Pacific dealers, elevators, warehouses, and jobbers, and an agreement with flour jobbers may also be printed in the RECORD, in order that at least a few people throughout the United States may know the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the matter referred to is printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION OF FOOD ADMINISTRATION GRAIN CORPORATION.

First. The name of this corporation is Food Administration Grain Corporation.

Second. The location of its principal office in the State of Delaware is No. 7 West Tenth Street, in the city of Wilmington, county of New Castle.

Third. This corporation is organized pursuant to an Executive order issued by the President of the United States, dated August 14, 1917, and in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by act of Congress entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

The objects and purposes for which and for any of which this corporation is formed are to do any or all of the things herein set forth to the same extent as natural persons might or could do, viz, to purchase, or otherwise acquire, manufacture, sell, or otherwise dispose of, store, handle, and otherwise deal in and with grain, food, feeds, and their products, and to do all acts and things necessary, expedient, or incidental to the efficient conduct of said business within or without the State of Delaware.

To exercise all powers which may be delegated to it by the President of the United States under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, as an agency authorized to be created under said act.

The foregoing clauses shall be construed both as objects and powers, and it is hereby expressly provided that the foregoing enumeration of specific powers shall not be held to limit or restrict in any manner the powers of this corporation.

In general, to have and to exercise all the powers conferred by the laws of Delaware upon corporations formed under the act hereinafter referred to.

Fourth. The total authorized capital stock of this corporation is $50,000,000 divided into 500,000 shares of $100 each.

The amount of capital stock with which this corporation will commence business is the sum of $2,900, being 29 shares of $100 each.

Fifth. The names and places of residence of each of the original subscribers to the capital stock and the number of shares subscribed for by each are as follows: Herbert Hoover, Washington, D. C., 27 shares; Edgar Rickard, Washington, D. C., 1 share; Curtis H. Lindley, Washington, D. C., 1 share.

Sixth. The duration of the existence of this corporation is the period of five years unless sooner dissolved in the manner provided by law.

Seventh. The property of the stockholders shall not be subject to the payment of corporate debts to any extent whatever.

Eighth. The directors of this corporation shall hold office for one year from the date of their election and until their successors are elected and qualified unless sooner removed. The holder or holders of two-thirds of the outstanding capital stock may call a special meeting of stockholders at any time, upon mailing notice to the other stockholders of the time and place of said meeting, three days prior to said appointed time, which notice may be waived by unanimous consent, or by the presence of all stockholders at said special meeting; and the stockholders present may by a majority vote remove any director or directors from office and elect a successor or successors to hold office for the remainder of the unexpired term.

In furtherance, and not in limitation, of the powers conferred by statute, the board of directors are expressly authorized to make, alter, amend, and rescind the by-laws of this corporation, and to authorize and cause to be executed mortgages and liens upon the personal property of this corporation, and to authorize the borrowing of such sums of money from time to time, and the making and execution of such notes, mortgages, pledges, and liens on the personal property of this corporation as they may deem advisable:

We, the undersigned, being each of the original subscribers to the capital stock hereinbefore named for the purpose of forming a corporation to do business both within and without the State of Delaware, and in pursuance of an act of the Legislature of the State of Delaware entitled "An act providing a general corporation law," approved March 10, 1899, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, do make and file this certificate, hereby declaring and certifying that the facts herein stated are true, and do respectively agree to take the number of shares of stock hereinbefore set forth, and accordingly have hereunto set our hands and seals this 14th day of August, A. D. 1917.

[United States Grain Corporation, 42 Broadway, New York City. Agreement with bakers.]

This agreement, made this —— day of ———, 19—, between the undersigned, hereinafter called the "Baker," party of the first part, and United States Grain Corporation, formerly Food Administration Grain Corporation, hereinafter called the "Grain Corporation," party of the second part.

Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter set forth it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

First. The words "guaranteed price" when used in this agreement mean the wheat primary market price fixed in the presidential proclamation of September 2, 1918 ($2.26 Chicago), or as such primary market price may hereafter be increased by Executive order or increased by the addition of storage premiums fixed by the Grain Corporation and publicly announced by it.

Second. The words "resale price" when used in this agreement mean a wheat price lower than the guaranteed price publicly announced by the Grain Corporation to be the wheat price for milling and upon which the adjustments hereinafter provided are to be based.

Third. In the event that the Grain Corporation announces a resale price of wheat it shall pay to the baker in respect to any wheat flour then owned by the baker, or under contract of purchase by him, the equivalent of the difference between the guaranteed price and the resale price at the ratio of 4½ bushels of wheat to 1 barrel of flour. In the event that thereafter the Grain Corporation should announce a return to the guaranteed price, or a resale price higher than the then current resale price, the baker, in response to any wheat flour then owned by the baker or under contract of purchase by him, shall pay to the Grain Corporation the equivalent of the difference between the then current resale price and the guaranteed price or the new resale price at the ratio of 4½ bushels of wheat to 1 barrel of flour. Similarly, if the Grain Corporation should announce a resale price either higher or lower than the then current resale price, like settlements shall be made.

Each of the parties to this agreement, as the case may be, shall make the foregoing payments weekly on statement and reports prescribed by the Grain Corporation as actual deliveries of bread and bakery products are made to the buyer until the amount of flour owned or under contract of purchase on which adjustment is to be made has been manufactured into bread and bakery products and delivered.

Fourth. During the continuance of any resale price the baker shall reflect into the price of bread and bakery products sold by him the reasonable equivalent of such resale price. If in the judgment of the Grain Corporation the baker is not reflecting into the price of bread and bakery products sold by him the reasonable equivalent of such resale price, and the baker refuses to adopt the expression of the Grain Corporation as to what is a reasonable reflection, the Grain Corporation shall submit the question to the United States Wheat Director for his decision. The opinion of the United States Wheat Director as to what constitutes such reflection shall be binding upon the parties to this agreement.

Fifth. Upon the date of the termination of this agreement, as hereinafter provided, the Grain Corporation will announce a price, which price in its judgment is a fair reflection of the guaranteed price or of the resale price, if any, then in effect, at which it will buy at certain standard basing points and markets the flour then owned by the baker or under contract of purchase by him. Such flour price as announced by the Grain Corporation will contemplate satisfactory flour, of not lower than 95 per cent so-called straight flour, and without premium for any higher grades. Thereupon the baker, within 10 days after such termination date, may file with the zone office of the Grain Corporation in the zone in which the baker's home office is located, an acceptance of such offer of the Grain Corporation, specifying the amount and details of the flour, and within 15 days thereafter the Grain Corporation shall give shipping orders and payment shall be made by demand draft, with documents attached, or as otherwise mutually arranged; provided, however, that at the time of accepting the Grain Corporation offer the baker may declare that he elects to defer delivery of the flour for a period of 45 days from the termination date, in order that he may continue to manufacture such flour into bread and bakery products. In that event the baker shall sell such bread and bakery products at a fair reflection of the 95 per cent straight flour price. All flour so used in manufacture by the baker shall cancel an equivalent amount of flour sold to the Grain Corporation by the acceptance aforesaid. At the expiration of such 45 days from the original termination date the baker may, by telegram filed the next succeeding day and addressed to the zone office of the Grain Corporation in which the baker's home office is located, advise the Grain Corporation of the amount of flour yet remaining from the originally designated quantities, and may then deliver to the Grain Corporation such unsold flour on the terms and conditions specified for the original delivery; provided that the baker may, by telegram and in the same manner, at the end of said 45-day period, take over such remaining flour for his own account.

Sixth. All purchases of flour by the baker shall be evidenced by contracts executed by buyer and seller, showing prices, terms, quantities, and conditions.

Seventh. The baker shall make and render reports in the manner and at such times as may be required by the Grain Corporation and open his books and records to the inspection of the Grain Corporation whenever requested by it.

Eighth. The baker shall not be entitled to any of the benefits or privileges of this agreement unless he shall hold such license as may at any time be required by proclamation of the President of the United States under and pursuant to an act of Congress relating to the national wheat guarantee, approved March 4, 1919. Should any such license be suspended or revoked, the baker shall thereupon lose all the benefits and privileges which otherwise would accrue to him under this agreement.

Ninth. This agreement may be terminated by the Grain Corporation by giving 45 days' previous notice thereof to the baker. Unless so terminated this agreement shall terminate on May 31, 1920.

Tenth. This agreement shall be governed by the laws of the State of New York.

[United States Grain Corporation, 42 Broadway, New York City. Agreement with wheat flour millers.]

This agreement made this —— day of ——, 19—, between the undersigned, hereinafter called the "Miller," party of the first part, and United States Grain Corporation, formerly Food Administration Grain Corporation, hereinafter called the "Grain Corporation," party of the second part.

Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter set forth, it is agreed between the parties hereto, as follows:

First: The following words and phrases when used in this agreement shall have the following meaning:

(1) "Guaranteed price" means the wheat primary market price fixed in the presidential proclamation of September 2, 1918 ($2.26 Chicago), or as such primary market price may hereafter be increased by Executive order, or increased by the addition of storage premiums fixed by the Grain Corporation, and publicly announced by it.

(2) "Resale price" means a wheat price, lower than the guaranteed price, publicly announced by the Grain Corporation to be the wheat price for milling and upon which adjustments with the miller are to be based. Such resale price shall in all markets specified in the aforesaid presidential proclamation bear the same relation to the guaranteed price in such markets as the resale price of the Grain Corporation at Chicago at the same time bears to the guaranteed price at Chicago, except at intermountain, Pacific coast, and other points where available freight structures or changes in freight rates requires special allowances.

(3) "Unsold wheat the miller has on hand," means all wheat owned by the miller at mills, in store, and in transit, and wheat under contract of purchase (except wheat purchased, or under contract of purchase, from the producer and not yet delivered or shipped by such producer) and from which total there has been deducted the equivalent of excess outstanding flour sales as provided for in paragraph (4) below.

(4) "Unsold flour the miller has on hand" means all flour owned by the miller at mills, in store, and in transit, and from which total there has been deducted all outstanding flour sales: Provided, however, That if such outstanding flour sales exceed all flour on hand, the surplus of such flour sales shall reduce "unsold wheat the miller has on hand," as in paragraph (3) above.

Second: To reduce wheat products to their equivalent in bushels of wheat, or to reduce wheat to its equivalent in barrels of flour, the empirical formula of 4½ bushels of 58 pounds or heavier wheat as the equivalent of one barrel of flour of 196 pounds shall be used, except for the purposes of indemnification under section 10 hereof.

Third: The miller, in buying wheat from the producer, shall purchase on the proper grade and dockage, under the Federal standards, and shall pay therefor not les than the guaranteed price based on such proper grade and dockage, at the terminal most advantageously reached, less freight, and less a reasonable handling margin. The miller shall keep a record showing all purchases from the producer, name of the seller, date, quantity, grade, and dockage fixed and price paid and reasons for fixing grade under No. 1, including test weight; and on all parcels of wheat on which there is a dispute as to grade and dockage or price between the miller and the producer at the time of delivery, a notation thereof shall be made upon the records of the miller and a sample shall be drawn by the producer and the miller and forwarded in a proper container to the vice president of the Grain

Corporation, in the zone in which the purchase is made, for his use in the determination of the dispute. The determination of the vice president shall be final and conclusive unless an appeal from such determination be filed within 10 days with the United States wheat director by either the producer or miller. In case of appeal the decision of the United States wheat director shall be final and conclusive. The miller shall keep a copy of this section prominently displayed at his place of business.

Fourth: The miller shall render promptly to the Grain Corporation a true weekly statement, under oath if required, setting forth such facts as the Grain Corporation desires, including particularly the production of wheat products during the weekly period, the sales of wheat products during the weekly period and the amount of wheat and wheat products on hand at the close of the weekly period.

Fifth: In case a resale price is announced the miller shall file with the Grain Corporation a sworn weekly report, or a new and exact report taken from the miller's books and records at the time of the cut-off, or at the close of business on the day preceding the day that the resale price takes effect, showing the amount of unsold wheat and unsold wheat products on hand and the outstanding sales of all wheat products against same, and weekly thereafter, until the resale price has by public announcement been canceled and the guaranteed price again made effective, the miller shall file with the Grain Corporation a sworn statement showing the amount of weekly sales of all wheat products.

Sixth: The miller shall during any resale price period limit the average net return of the sale of wheat products to a basis not exceeding the cost of wheat to the miller, plus an operating charge not to exceed 25 cents per bushel calculated to f. o. b. mill bulk basis, with allowance for certain differentials for various classes of sales as provided in Exhibit "A" hereto annexed, which exhibit shall also contain a definition of cost of wheat to the miller for manufacturing purposes. If the resale price periods should be separated by guaranteed price periods, the limitation on net return shall be based on the average of the consolidated resale price periods. If upon the termination of this agreement, the limitation thus prescribed on average net return is exceeded, the miller shall pay such excess to the Grain Corporation. The audit to determine such excess, if any, shall be made upon the termination of this agreement, in accordance with the provisions of Exhibit "A."

Seventh: The miller shall not make, or have outstanding at any time, any contract for the sale of wheat products except such contract as requires shipment or delivery within 60 days after the date of sale, which date shall be truly stated in the contract: Provided, however, That this limitation shall not apply to contracts with the Federal, State, or municipal governments: And provided further, That no contract shall be made for shipment or delivery beyond June 30, 1920, except in connection with the exercise by the miller of privileges given by section 11 hereof. All purchases and sales of wheat products shall be evidenced by contracts executed by buyer and seller showing prices, terms, quantities, and conditions.

Eighth: At any time, and from time to time prior to the termination of this agreement, the Grain Corporation shall purchase in accordance with the purchasing rules and customs, upon the request of the miller, all unsold wheat the miller has on hand, at the guaranteed price (plus 7/30 of 1 cent per bushel per week in case of discontinuance of advancing premiums as provided in section 9), delivered at the terminal or terminals designated by the miller.

Ninth: In the event that the Grain Corporation should discontinue further increase in its premiums, which by public announcement it had added to the guaranteed price, the Grain Corporation after and during such discontinuance of advancing premiums, shall pay to the miller 7/30 of 1 cent per bushel per week on the unsold wheat the miller has on hand and the unsold flour the miller has on hand in wheat equivalent.

Tenth: In the event that the Grain Corporation announces a resale price of wheat, the Grain Corporation shall on and after that date and during the continuance of such resale price period, in respect to the unsold wheat and unsold wheat products the miller has on hand at the resale date and the wheat purchased during the resale price period, pay to the miller the difference between the guaranteed price and the resale price on all sales of wheat products made during such period, in accordance with the audit rules provided in Exhibit "A."

Eleventh: Upon the termination of this agreement (except this agreement be terminated as provided in clause (3) of section 15 hereof, in which event this section 11 shall be inoperative) the miller may exercise either of the following options in respect to the unsold wheat and unsold wheat flour on hand at the date of such termination; the option to be used shall be specified by telegram, filed on the day next succeeding the termination, and addressed to the zone office of the Grain Corporation in which zone the head office of the miller is located, and the exact amount and details of such wheat and wheat flour shall be given, under proper verification, within 10 days after such termination date:

(A) The miller may retain and take over all unsold wheat and unsold wheat products: Provided, That if at the termination of this agreement there shall be in effect a Grain Corporation resale price lower than the guaranteed price, the Grain Corporation will pay to the miller, on proper verification, the difference between the guaranteed price and the resale price on the amount of unsold wheat and unsold wheat products the miller has on hand.

(B) The miller may sell to the Grain Corporation at the guaranteed price all or any part of the unsold wheat the miller has on hand, and the miller will make delivery of such amount as designated as sold to the Grain Corporation under this option, at any terminal selected by the miller at which the Grain Corporation maintains a buying basis: Provided, however, That the Grain Corporation may take delivery, basis f. o. b. cars at miller's point of origin, at the freight deduction from the Grain Corporation guaranteed price at the terminal selected by the miller. In the event of either delivery specified, the Grain Corporation will allow the miller one-thirtieth of 1 cent per bushel per day from date of tender until delivery is actually completed and/or payment made: Provided, however, At the time of exercising this option "B," the miller may declare that he elects to defer delivery of the wheat, or any part thereof, for a period of 45 days in order that he may continue to sell his unsold flour and to mill such unsold wheat and sell same as flour, through his usual trade channels. In that event the miller shall sell such flour at a proper reflection, as provided herein, of any adjustment due to any resale price then existing or afterwards directed by the Grain Corporation. All sales of flour thereafter in excess of the amount of unsold flour the miller has on hand at date of termination, shall cancel an equivalent amount of wheat sold to the Grain Corporation under this option "B." At the expiration of such 45 days, the miller may, by telegram filed the next succeeding day and addressed to the zone office of the Grain Corporation in which zone the head office of the miller is located, advise the Grain Corporation of the amount of unsold wheat yet remaining from the originally designated quantities, and, without allowance for carrying charges during such 45 days, may then deliver to the Grain Corporation the balance of the unsold wheat on the terms and conditions specified in this option "B" for actual delivery to the Grain Corporation: And provided further, That the miller may, by telegram and in the same manner, at the end of the said 45 days' period, take over all unsold wheat and/or unsold wheat products for his own account on the general terms and conditions as specified in option "A."

Twelfth. The verification of the statements and reports and the audit and examination of the accounts of the miller as may be required by the Grain Corporation, shall be made at the expense of the Grain Corporation by certified public accountants selected by it acting under the auditing rules set forth in Exhibit A; such additional rules as may be found necessary shall be formulated by a special board of certified public accountants selected by the Grain Corporation for that purpose and such additional rules shall be consistent with and shall not modify or change the terms and conditions of this agreement and shall be promulgated and used only after such additional rules have been adopted by the Grain Corporation and a committee of millers of the United States of not more than 21 members to be selected for the purposes of this agreement by the United States Wheat Director, and such additional rules as shall be agreed to by the Grain Corporation and by such committee acting by a majority of its number shall be binding on both parties to this agreement: And provided also, That any disagreements between the parties hereto as to the interpretation or application of said audit rules in Exhibit A hereto attached or such additional audit rules as may be promulgated as in this section provided, may be settled and adjusted between said Grain Corporation and said committee of millers, and said settlement and adjustment of any such audit rule so arrived at between said Grain Corporation and said committee of millers shall be binding upon the parties hereto.

Thirteenth. The miller shall make and render reports in the manner and at such times as may be required by the Grain Corporation and open his books and records to the inspection of the Grain Corporation whenever requested by it.

Fourteenth. The miller shall not be entitled to any of the benefits or privileges of this agreement unless he shall hold such license as may at any time be required by proclamation of the President of the United States, under and pursuant to an act of Congress relating to the national wheat guarantee, approved March 4, 1919. Should any such license be suspended or revoked, the miller shall thereupon lose all the benefits and privileges which otherwise would accrue to him under this agreement; except and provided only that for a period of 15 days after such suspension or revocation the Grain Corporation shall purchase, upon the request of the miller, the unsold wheat the miller has on hand at the date of such suspension or revocation, at the guaranteed price, in accordance with section 8 hereof, but without the carrying charge of seven-thirtieths of 1 cent per bushel per week provided in said section.

Fifteenth. This agreement may be terminated:

(1) At any time by mutual agreement between the Grain Corporation and a majority of the committee of millers provided for in section 12.

(2) By the Grain Corporation, by giving 45 days' previous written notice of such termination to the miller.

(3) By the miller, party of the first part hereto, by giving 45 days' previous notice of such termination to the Grain Corporation: Provided, however, That this agreement can not be so terminated unless prior to the receipt of such notice by the Grain Corporation two-thirds of the members of the committee of millers provided for in section 12 hereof shall have lodged with the president of the Grain Corporation, at its office at 42 Broadway, New York City, a recommendation to the Grain Corporation that a termination of this agreement by notice from the miller should be allowed. In the event that notice of termination is given by the miller in accordance with this clause (3), the miller shall not receive the seven-thirtieths of 1 cent per bushel per week for carrying charges, as provided elsewhere in this agreement, after such notice is given.

Unless this agreement is terminated by one of the three methods above set forth, this agreement shall terminate on May 31, 1920.

Sixteenth. This agreement shall be governed by the laws of the State of New York.

EXHIBIT A.

General auditing rules referred to in agreement between the United States Grain Corporation and the miller.

The following definitions and general rules shall be observed in the conduct of audits under the terms of this agreement:

DEFINITIONS GOVERNING AUDIT.

"Flour": For the purpose of this agreement, "Flour" shall be considered to include all products of wheat other than bran, shorts, feed middlings, and red dog, or their combination (with the exception of whole wheat and graham flour, which products shall be determined by the mill's actual yield records).

"Barrel of flour": A barrel of flour shall be computed as 196 pounds.

"Wheat products": The entire products manufactured in wheat milling process.

"Time of audit": The books of the miller shall be open to the Grain Corporation at any time and shall be subject to final audit of the Grain Corporation not earlier than 20 days after termination of the agreement and shall be diligently continued until completion, and the miller shall have his books and records ready for audit within 20 days after the termination.

"Audit period": The audit of conversion and distribution differential returns by the Grain Corporation shall apply to the business of the miller only during the period or periods in which the miller is operating on wheat on which he has received indemnification through price adjustment as provided in section 6 of the agreement.

RULES GOVERNING AUDIT.

Audit rule 1—resale prices of various grades: (First paragraph, section 2 of agreement.) In the event of the establishment of a "resale price," the same reduction in cents per bushel shall apply to grades other than No. 1, as applied to No. 1 wheat.

Audit rule 2—flour inventory basis: Inventory of flour on hand shall be calculated to a basis of barrels of 196 pounds of flour.

Audit rule 3—jobbing: The miller operating warehouses and/or performing a jobbing service shall have the option of considering flour at warehouses or in transit to warehouses as separate and distinct from his mill stock and shall in such event be subject to the rules and regulations governing jobbers of flour.

Audit rule 4—manufacturing cost of wheat to the miller: To arrive at "manufacturing cost of wheat to the miller," the unsold wheat on hand as reported at the beginning of any "resale price period" shall be arrived at, subject to the verification by the Grain Corporation, as follows:

(a) Actual weigh-up; or

(b) On mill records of that date.

To arrive at the actual cost of wheat on hand the miller shall be required to take the amount paid for the last purchased equivalent quantity, making proper adjustments for differing grades, and to this amount shall be added for the purpose of determining "manufacturing cost of wheat to the miller":

(a) Local freight, if any, to the mill.

(b) Expenses actually incurred in buying, handling, and delivery to the mill, except those expenses properly included in (c).

(c) The reasonable handling margin on such wheat as is purchased direct from the producer in accordance with section 3 of the agreement: Provided, That the addition of such margin shall in no case produce a cost of wheat exceeding proper terminal price less freight.

(d) Seven-twentieths of a cent per bushel per week as a carrying charge, to be set up weekly based on weekly statements to the Grain Corporation of wheat and wheat products, in wheat equivalent, on hand, as an addition to "manufacturing cost of wheat to the miller."

The wheat purchased during the "resale price period" shall be computed at actual price paid, plus the permitted charges "a," "b," "c," and "d" as above provided for. The grand total of cost of all wheat above referred to, divided by the total number of bushels, will determine the price per bushel of "manufacturing cost of wheat to the miller" for the "resale price period." In each subsequent "resale price period" having a different "resale price," the "manufacturing cost of wheat to the miller" shall be likewise determined.

[Note: The miller operating as a grain dealer shall not sell wheat to his milling department at a price in excess of the price that his grain department could sell to others at the same time wheat of equal value (grade, variety, and location being taken into consideration.)]

Audit rule 5—sales entitled to indemnification: Indemnification as per section 10 of the agreement in the event of the establishment of a resale price shall be paid to the miller by the Grain Corporation on all wheat products sold during the resale price period and for which indemnification is claimed by the miller, payment to be made against shipments and/or deliveries per audit rule No. 8.

Audit rule 6—weight factor for basis of indemnification: The total pounds of wheat products shipped or delivered, and as evidenced by the reports referred to in audit rule No. 7, divided by 60, shall determine the number of bushels upon which the miller is to be paid indemnification by the Grain Corporation.

Audit rule 7—weekly reports of shipments: Weekly reports covering shipments and/or deliveries against sales of wheat products made during a "resale price period" shall be made and certified to on forms prescribed for that purpose by the Grain Corporation. These weekly reports shall set forth:

(a) The "resale price" (Chicago basis) established in cents per bushel.

(b) The date of the sale.

(c) Name and address of car lot purchaser.

[Note: On shipments and/or deliveries in less than car lots, name and address may be omitted unless specially required.]

(d) Kinds and amounts in pounds of products.

[Note: The total of shipments and/or deliveries in less than car lots may be shown as one item in weekly report unless specially required.]

(e) Invoice numbers against which shipments and/or deliveries have been made, which numbers shall be noted on mill's duplicate of invoice to purchaser.

Audit rule 8—indemnification to be paid milliers weekly: Indemnification as per section 10 of the agreement on sales made during any "resale price period," shall be paid weekly to the miller by the Grain Corporation against his weekly shipments and/or deliveries on such sales of wheat products made during a "resale price period" and as shown in his weekly report as provided for in the preceding audit rule 7.

Audit rule 9—computation of miller's manufacturing and distribution differential: The method of accounting by the miller for the net sales returns accruing from wheat products made from wheat on which the miller has been indemnified by the Grain Corporation shall be as follows:

Credits to miller: (a) The cost of wheat per bushel as determined by audit rule No. 4 ("manufacturing cost of wheat to the miller"), multiplied by the number of bushels of wheat on which indemnity has been paid, shall constitute the entire charge for wheat for the "resale-price period or periods."

[NOTE.—The miller grinding soft wheat may use 102 per cent of his sales of soft-wheat products during any and all "resale-price periods," calculated in pounds, and divide said number of pounds by 60 to determine the number of bushels of soft wheat to be charged to cost of wheat.]

(b) Operating charge of 25 cents per bushel multiplied by the number of bushels on which indemnity has been paid.

Debits to miller: (a) The total amount of indemnification received from the Grain Corporation.

(b) Any balance accruing to the miller through the use of transit billing in the milling and forwarding of wheat products on which indemnification is received shall be credited to sales returns. The miller may use his own method of accounting for same, provided such method reflects actual cost of freight.

(c) The net sales returns from wheat products accruing from the number of bushels of wheat on which indemnity has been paid, calculated to f. o. b. mill, bulk basis, by deducting the following differentials on different classes of sales:

Deduction 1. Local freight charges from mill and/or warehouses to point of delivery of sale if sold and invoiced on delivered price basis.

Deduction 2. Market price of containers in 1,000 lots on date of sale.

Deduction 3. Actual cost of delivery when such delivery is made by transportation facilities furnished by the miller.

Deduction 4. On all sales of flour in straight car lots 15 cents per barrel and on all sales of wheat mill feeds in straight car lots 50 cents per ton.

Deduction 5. On all sales of mixed carloads containing either wheat flour, mixed flour, wheat-flour substitutes, and feeds 40 cents per barrel of flour and $1 per ton of feeds. A mixed carload shall be construed to be a carload containing not less than 25 per cent of wheat flour and/or mixed flour, wheat-flour substitutes, and/or feed.

Deduction 6. On all sales from cars or docks, car lots (not delivered), where flour has been forwarded "on consignment," 40 cents per barrel.

Deduction 7. On all sales from cars or docks, less than carload (not delivered), where flour has been forwarded "on consignment," 50 cents per barrel.

Deduction 8. On all sales to other than consumers in less than carloads (except as stated under deductions 6 and 7 above) (not delivered), 65 cents per barrel.

Deduction 9. On sales to individual consumers (bakers and public eating places excepted) in less than carloads—on flour, $1.35 per barrel; on feed, $7 per ton.

Deduction 10. On sales of feed to wholesale feed dealers in less than carload lots and 1 ton or over, $2 per ton.

Deduction 11. On sales of feed to retail feed dealers in less than carload lots and 1 ton or over, $3 per ton.

Deduction 12. On sales to any feed dealer in lots of less that 1 ton, $4 per ton.

Deduction 13. The licensee miller and/or blender manufacturing self-rising flour shall be entitled on sales of same to an additional deduction of 25 cents per barrel on the wheat flour used in such products plus the cost or market value (whichever is the higher on date of shipment) of other ingredients used.

Note to audit rule 9. The total credits and debits to the miller as herein specified are to be considered as a whole and not as individual items of either cost of wheat, operating charge, or as sales of wheat products.

Audit rule 10. Wheat products and other ingredients: Any miller mixing wheat products with products of other grain and/or other ingredients, or manufacturing cereal specialties and/or pancake flour, may sell to his cereal department at the current price such wheat products as are required for such purposes, and after such products have been thus sold may have the privilege of operating independently of all charge limitations on such products, but in that event the licensee miller or blender will not be entitled to further indemnification on such wheat-products portion of said mixed products, cereal specialties, and/or pancake flour in event another "resale price" is established.

Audit rule 11. Export sales: The miller grinding wheat and exporting the flour produced therefrom shall, under proper verification on prescribed form of report, be entitled to the same indemnification as allowed on domestic business on the wheat used to produce such flour, but such indemnification and the returns from such export sales (except those made to the Grain Corporation) shall not be included in his reports for final accounting.

Audit rule 12. Method adjustment, final audit: A rule will hereafter be promulgated by the committee of millers and wheat director to more clearly define the purpose of the final audit, so that the net sales return on the indemnified wheat will reflect approximately the mill's output grind and the audit made on a basis that will not penalize the miller or inure to his benefit.

Audit rule 13. Grain Corporation may withhold payments against unsatisfactory reports: If, in the opinion of the Grain Corporation, the verified reports as rendered by the miller as to amount of unsold wheat and unsold flour on hand on May 31, 1920, or earlier termination date (or at termination of 45-day extension, as provided in section 11 of the agreement) are not sufficiently supported to justify it in considering same as being the actual weight of wheat and amount of flour on hand to carry out the provisions of section 11 of the agreement then in that case the Grain Corporation will accept same conditionally and will pay 75 per cent of the amount claimed by the miller as due, under the options in section 11 of the agreement selected by the miller, within 10 days after receipt of such report unless, in the judgment of the Grain Corporation, this payment should be reduced to protect the Grain Corporation on final settlement as per section 6 of the agreement, and will pay the balance due when the miller has to the satisfaction of the Grain Corporation verified the report furnished to the Grain Corporation with actual weights and/or counts, and final payment shall be made to the miller within 10 days after receipt of such final reports. Balances due the miller shall bear interest, to be paid by the United States Grain Corporation, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

Audit rule 14. Segregation of elevator operations: The miller may operate his elevator at milling plant and/or his country elevators independent of his milling operations under rules and regulations governing grain dealers.

Audit rule 15. Final accounting to Grain Corporation: Excess credits, if any, due the Grain Corporation under the terms of section 6 of this agreement shall be credited to the account of the Grain Corporation on the books of the miller from time to time as the miller in his judgment shall deem necessary to reflect such excess credits, but final accounting for such excess credits, if any, shall be made at the date of the final audit as provided herein. This account, however, shall be subject to adjustment from month to month as may be necessary to reflect the current operation of the miller during a resale period or periods under the provisions of the manufacturing charge and distribution differential limitations. This rule will be further amended, if circumstances require, to more fully describe the method of final accounting and to protect the interests of the parties under the procedure above indicated.

[United States Grain Corporation, 42 Broadway, New York City. Agreement with dealers, elevators, and brokers.]

This agreement, made this ——— day of ———, 19—, between the undersigned, hereinafter called the "dealer," party of the first part, and United States Grain Corporation, formerly Food Administration Grain Corporation, hereinafter called the "grain corporation," party of the second part.

Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter set forth, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

First. The words "guaranteed price" when used in this agreement mean the wheat primary market price fixed in the presidential proclamation of September 2, 1918 ($2.26 Chicago), or as such primary market price may hereafter be increased by Executive order or increased by the addition of storage premiums fixed by the Grain Corporation and publicly announced by it.

Second. The dealer in buying wheat from the producer shall purchase on the proper grade and dockage, under the Federal standards, and shall pay therefor not less than the guaranteed price based on such proper grade and dockage, at the terminal most advantageously reached, less freight, and less a reasonable handling margin. The dealer shall keep a record showing all purchases from the producer, name of the seller, date, quantity, grade, and dockage fixed and price paid and reasons for fixing grade under No. 1, including test weight; and on all parcels of wheat on which there is a dispute as to grade and dockage or price between the dealer and the producer at the time of delivery a notation thereof shall be made upon the records of the dealer and a sample shall be drawn by the producer and the dealer and forwarded in a proper container to the vice president of the Grain Corporation in the zone in which the purchase is made for his use in the determination of the dispute. The determination of the vice president shall be final and conclusive unless an appeal from such determination be filed within 10 days with the United States Wheat Director by either the producer or dealer. In case of appeal the decision of the United States Wheat Director shall be final and conclusive. The dealer shall keep a copy of this section prominently displayed at his place of business.

Third. At any time and from time to time prior to the termination of this agreement the Grain Corporation shall purchase, at the guaranteed price, in accordance with its purchasing rules and customs, upon the request of the dealer, to be delivered at the terminal or terminals designated by the dealer, all or any part of the unsold wheat owned by the dealer, whether in store or in transit (except wheat purchased or under contract of purchase from the producer and not yet delivered or shipped by such producer).

Fourth. In case the dealer shall be unable, after using every effort and all diligence to ship in any week such total quantity of all grain as makes the equivalent of at least 20 per cent of the amount of wheat (wheat only) in his elevator and owned by him at the beginning of such week, the Grain Corporation shall pay to the dealer to cover insurance and interest for such week seven-twentieths of a cent per bushel on the amount of wheat in the elevator and owned by him at the beginning of such week: Provided, however, That in the event that the Grain Corporation announces that it has established and includes in the guaranteed price an advancing premium framed to reflect a fair carrying charge, this section shall not be effective during the period of such advancing premium.

Fifth. Upon the date of the termination of this agreement, as hereinafter provided, the Grain Corporation shall, at the request of the dealer, purchase for delivery to it at the terminal selected by the dealer, at the guaranteed price, or, at the option of the Grain Corporation, f. o. b. the dealer's elevator, at the guaranteed price, less freight to said terminal, all or any part of the unsold wheat of the dealer on hand and in transit (except wheat purchased or under contract of purchase from the producer and not yet delivered or shipped by such producer). The details as to quantity, probable grade, and position shall be furnished to the Grain Corporation by the dealer not later than 10 days after the date of termination.

Sixth. The dealer shall not store in any elevator or warehouse at any seaport of the United States wheat or wheat products for a longer period than 30 days without the express permission, in writing, from the Grain Corporation.

Seventh. The dealer shall make and render reports in the manner and at such time as may be required by the Grain Coorporation and open his books and records to the inspection of the Grain Corporation whenever requested by it.

Eighth. The dealer shall not be entitled to any of the benefits or privileges of this agreement unless he shall hold such license as may at any time be required by proclamation of the President of the United States, under and pursuant to an act of Congress relating to the national wheat guarantee, approved March 4, 1919. Should any such license be suspended or revoked the dealer shall thereupon lose all the benefits and privileges which otherwise would accrue to him under this agreement, except and provided only that for a period of 15 days after such suspension or revocation the Grain Coorporation shall purchase, upon the request of the dealer, the unsold wheat owned by the dealer at the date of such suspension or revocation at the guaranteed price in accordance with section 3 hereof.

Ninth. This agreement may be terminated by the Grain Coorporation by giving 45 days' previous notice thereof to the dealer. Unless so terminated this agreement shall terminate on May 31, 1920.

Tenth. This agreement shall be governed by the laws of the State of New York.

Agreement with Pacific coast dealers, elevators, warehouses, and jobbers.]

This agreement made this —— day of ———, 19—, between the undersigned, hereinafter called the "dealer," party of the first part, and United States Grain Corporation, formerly Food Administration Grain Corporation, hereinafter called the "Grain Corporation," party of the second part—

Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter set forth, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

1. The words "guaranteed price," when used in this agreement, mean the wheat primary market price fixed in the presidential proclamation of September 2, 1918 ($2.26 Chicago), or as such primary market price may hereafter be increased by Executive order or increased by the addition of storage premiums fixed by the Grain Corporation and publicly announced by it.

2. The dealer, in buying wheat from the producer, shall purchase on the proper grade and dockage, under the Federal standards, and shall pay therefor not less than the guaranteed price based on such proper grade and dockage, at the terminal most advantageously reached, less freight and less a reasonable handling margin. The dealer shall keep a record showing all purchases from the producer, name of the seller, date, quantity, grade and dockage fixed, and price paid and reasons for fixing grade under No. 1, including test weight; and on all parcels of wheat on which there is a dispute as to grade and dockage or price between the dealer and the producer at the time of delivery, a notation thereof shall be made upon the records of the dealer and a sample shall be drawn by the producer and the dealer and forwarded in a proper container to the vice president of the Grain Corporation in the zone in which the purchase is made, for his use in the determination of the dispute. The determination of the vice president shall be final and conclusive unless an appeal from such determination be filed within 10 days with the United States Wheat Director by either the producer or dealer. In case of appeal the decision of the United States Wheat Director shall be final and conclusive. The dealer shall keep a copy of this section prominently displayed at his place of business.

3. At any time, and from time to time prior to the termination of this agreement, the Grain Corporation shall purchase, at the guaranteed price, in accordance with its purchasing rules and customs, upon the request of the dealer, to be delivered at the terminal or terminals designated by the dealer, all or any part of the unsold wheat owned by the dealer, whether in store or in transit (except wheat purchased or under contract of purchase from the producer and not yet delivered or shipped by such producer).

5. In case the dealer shall not ship in any week at least 20 per cent of the amount of wheat owned by him in his elevator or warehouse and in other storage at the beginning of such week, the Grain Corporation shall pay to the dealer, to cover insurance and interest for such week, seven-twentieth of 1 cent per bushel on the amount of wheat owned by him in his elevator or warehouse or other storage at the beginning of such week: Provided, however, That in the event that the Grain Corporation announces that it has established and includes in the guaranteed price an advancing premium, framed to reflect a fair carrying charge, this section shall not be effective during the period of such advancing premium.

[United States Grain Corporation, 42 Broadway, New York City.
Agreement with flour jobbers.]

This agreement, made this —— day of ———, 19—, between the undersigned, hereinafter called the "Flour Jobber," party of the first part, and United States Grain Corporation, formerly Food Administration Grain Corporation, hereinafter called the "Grain Corporation," party of the second part.

Witnesseth, That for and in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter set forth, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

First. The words "guaranteed price" when used in this agreement, mean the wheat primary market price fixed in the presidential proclamation of September 2, 1918 ($2.26 Chicago), or as such primary market price may hereafter be increased by Executive order or increased by the addition of storage premiums fixed by the Grain Corporation and publicly announced by it.

Second. The words "resale price" when used in this agreement mean a wheat price lower than the guaranteed price publicly announced by the Grain Corporation to be the wheat price for milling and upon which the adjustments hereinafter provided are to be based.

Third. In the event that the Grain Corporation announces a resale price of wheat, it shall pay to the flour jobber in respect to any wheat flour then owned by the flour jobber or under contract of purchase by him, the equivalent of the difference between the guaranteed price and the resale price at the ratio of four and one-half bushels of wheat to one barrel of flour. In the event that thereafter the Grain Corporation should announce a return to the guaranteed price or a resale price higher than the then current resale price, the flour jobber, in respect to any wheat flour then owned by the flour jobber or under contract of purchase by him, shall pay to the Grain Corporation the equivalent of the difference between the then current resale price and the guaranteed price or the new resale price, at the ratio of four and one-half bushels of wheat to one barrel of flour. Similarly, if the Grain Corporation should announce a resale price either higher or lower than the then current resale price, like settlements shall be made. Each of the parties to this agreement, as the case may be, shall make the foregoing payments weekly on statements and reports prescribed by the Grain Corporation as actual deliveries of flour are made to the buyer until the amount of flour owned or under contract of purchase on which adjustment is to be made has been delivered.

Fourth. During the continuance of any resale price the flour jobber shall reflect into the price of flour sold by him the reasonable equivalent of such resale price. If, in the judgment of the Grain Corporation the flour jobber is not reflecting into the price of flour sold by him the reasonable equivalent of such resale price and the flour jobber refuses to adopt the expression of the Grain Corporation as to what is a reasonable reflection the Grain Corporation shall submit the question to the United States Wheat Director for his decision. The opinion of the United States Wheat Director as to what constitutes such reflection into the price of flour sold by the flour jobber shall be binding upon the parties to this agreement.

Fifth. Upon the date of the termination of this agreement, as hereinafter provided, the Grain Corporation will announce a price, which price in its judgment is a fair reflection of the guaranteed price or of the resale price, if any, then in effect, at which it will buy at certain standard basing points and markets such unsold stocks of flour then owned by the flour jobber, or under contract of purchase by him. Such flour price as announced by the Grain Corporation will contemplate satisfactory flour, of not lower than 95 per cent so-called straight flour, and without premium for any higher grades. Thereupon the flour jobber, within 10 days after such termination date, may file with the zone office of the Grain Corporation in the zone in which the flour jobber's home office is located, an acceptance of such offer of the Grain Corporation, specifying the amount and details of the flour, and within 15 days thereafter the Grain Corporation shall give shipping orders, and payment shall be made by demand draft with documents attached, or as otherwise mutually arranged: Provided, however, That at the time of accepting the Grain Corporation offer the flour jobber may declare that he elects to defer delivery of the flour for a period of 45 days from the termination date in order that he may continue to sell such unsold flour through his usual trade channels. In that event, the flour jobber shall sell such flour at a fair reflection of the 95 per cent straight flour price, taking into consideration any differing grades of flour and differing terms. All sales of flour by the flour jobber thereafter shall cancel an equivalent amount of flour sold to the Grain Corporation by the acceptance aforesaid. During this 45-day period the Grain Corporation may direct the flour jobber to advance or reduce the price of the flour from the basis announced by the Grain Corporation as its purchase basis, and, in that event, the Grain Corporation shall pay or receive such difference to or from the flour jobber as the sales and deliveries are properly evidenced. At the expiration of such 45 days from the original termination date, the flour jobber may, by telegram filed the next succeeding day and addressed to the zone office of the Grain Corporation in which the flour jobber's home office is located, advise the Grain Corporation of the amount of unsold flour yet remaining from the originally designated quantities, and may then deliver to the Grain Corporation such unsold flour, on the terms and conditions specified for the original delivery. Provided, That the flour jobber may, by telegram and in the same manner at the end of said 45-day period, take over such unsold flour for his own account: And provided further, That if in the meantime the Grain Corporation has directed the flour jobber to resell such flour at a different basis than the flour price publicly announced on the termination date of the original contract, settlement on such flour taken over by the flour jobber on the termination of the 45-day period shall be made with the Grain Corporation on the new price basis so directed by the Grain Corporation.

Sixth. All purchases of flour by the flour jobber shall be evidenced by contracts executed by buyer and seller, showing prices, terms, quantities, and conditions, and no contract shall be made that specifies delivery of flour later than 60 days from the date of such contract.

Seventh. The flour jobber shall make and render report in the manner and at such times as may be required by the Grain Corporation and open his books and records to the inspection of the Grain Corporation whenever requested by it.

Eighth. The flour jobber shall not be entitled to any of the benefits or privileges of this agreement unless he shall hold such license as may at any time be required by proclamation of the President of the United States under and pursuant to an act of Congress relating to the national wheat guarantee, approved March 4, 1919. Should any such license be suspended or revoked the flour jobber shall thereupon lose all the benefits and privileges which otherwise would accrue to him under this agreement.

Ninth. This agreement may be terminated by the Grain Corporation by giving 45 days previous notice thereof to the flour jobber. Unless so terminated this agreement shall terminate on May 31, 1920.

Tenth. This agreement shall be governed by the laws of the State of New York.

Important: This information must be supplied:

Location (street, city, county, State).

Estimated amount of flour handled per month (barrels per month).

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I was making an effort to show the actual conditions with reference to the stocks of wheat in the country. According to the statement which I read a moment ago, there is an overestimate, and, as the shrinkage, according to the grain director's own statement, is at least 5 per cent—and, as I said a moment ago, I am inclined to believe that it is more this year—that would amount to 46,000,000 bushels, which, added to 23,000,000 bushels, makes 69,000,000 bushels.

Mr. President, in order that the Senate may understand that I have carried on no propaganda with reference to my bill, I desire to say that I have not solicited the support of a single individual or a single citizen of this country in favor of that bill. I have not sent a telegram or a letter to any farm organization or any other organization in support of the bill. The only interview which I have given out is one which I gave to a very respectable, high-class man who happens to live in the State of Minnesota. That interview I wish to read, to show that I have given no interviews, carried on no propaganda, except for the statements I have made on the floor of the Senate, and those statements, I believe, will stand for themselves, and will show that whatever I have done I have done in the interest of the consumer and the producer and not in the interest of speculators. This was my interview:

Section 14 of the act approved August 10, 1917, provides for the guaranty of the price of wheat at $2 per bushel. It also authorizes the President to fix a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat in order to assure the producers a reasonable profit. This same section of the food law also provides that the President may use any agency of the Government, or he may set up a new agency for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this law. My bill does not repeal this section of the food law, and it was not the intention of our committee to repeal it. It is true that the bill in its present form provides for the repeal of the act approved March 4, 1919, which also provides for a fund of $1,000,000,000, and gives the President the same authority as provided for in section 14 of the original act.

The Food Administration Grain Corporation was organized under the State laws of the State of Delaware, with a capital stock of $50,000,000. The grain director is therefore operating under the laws of the State of Delaware, and not under our Federal laws.

The purpose of this bill—

I am speaking now of my bill—was to abolish the Grain Corporation. If the pending bill does not properly safeguard the guaranty, we can easily amend it by a very few words, and say that the President, through the Secretary of Agriculture, is authorized and directed to buy and sell wheat whenever the price of wheat goes below the fixed price, and that the $1,000,000,000 fund turned into the Treasury may be used for this purpose. All this work can easily be done through the Bureau of Markets in the Department of Agriculture, with no additional expense to the Government.

It is difficult to see how any man, no matter how able he may be, can properly safeguard the producers' interest and at the same time manage the campaign of some distinguished gentleman for President of the United States.

Mr. President, I felt like saying that much; I said it and I repeat it.

I have here before me an advertisement taken from the Literary Digest and sent to me by a high-class newspaper man, who informs me that the advertisement cost $6,000 for one issue. This is just one incident; but Mr. Barnes has a billion-dollar appropriation, and I know that last year he made a net profit of nearly $24,000,000 from grain sold to neutrals. What he has made this year I can not positively state, but I understand that the total amount is approximately $50,000,000. How can any Senator or any Representative in Congress combat such a damnable force as that, operating amongst the 29,000 licensees under the control of Mr. Barnes? All he has to do is to touch the wires and what he says will go to all of these agencies. I am going to read one telegram, which I believe contains from 300 to 400 words, and which I have been told he sent to more than 600 delegates attending a convention at New York in June last.

This telegram was sent in the first days of February, and was evidently sent to members of the convention held last June in New York City, called by the wheat director:

The press reports the Senate Agricultural Committee favorably reporting the Gronna bill, which will terminate on passage of the wheat guaranty and the appropriation making it effective. The committee apparently voted for it unanimously, without any investigation of the disastrous effects which would certainly follow.

Senator GRONNA on February 2 stated his opinion that wheat would sell higher without the guaranty, and therefore the appropriation and the administrative organization not now required. On the very day bill reaches Senate the collapse of wheat price even in Minneapolis market carried certain grades within 5 cents of the Government guaranty basis. The withdrawal of the underlying assurance of Government readiness to purchase at the guaranteed price might produce a further decline below the guaranty, and this termination would be a substantial repudiation of a national pledge still running four months, while two hundred millions of wheat still on the farm, two hundred millions in dealers' hands, and large stocks of flour rely on the assurance of Government buying to the end of the pledge, June 1.

With all the security possible, the marketing machinery is exposed to great uncertainties and hazards, as demonstrated in collapse of overseas exchange, suspended export trade, even in foods. I should be glad to terminate our work, but can not allow Congress, without warning of its disastrous results, to expose producer and handler by such an act of repudiation.

You were a delegate to the June convention, and with your advice and assistance was constructed the system of trade agreements which for seven months protected the grower pledge without loss to the National Treasury.

This whole structure now jeopardized by this proposed act and irreparable damage in undermining confidence already done by its mere introduction. You must recognize our obligation and your own toward menaced producers and dealers. What steps do you suggest advisable to take?

JULIUS H. BARNES.

Evidently sent to six or seven hundred delegates.

We are economizing; we are cutting down appropriations; we are denying departments appropriations which they actually ought to have in order to stimulate production; yet, in the face of that, this agency is carrying on a propaganda unheard of in the history our our country; and spending whose money?

If the Senators will go to the Secretary's office and examine the reports, they will find that he is spending the Government's money, which he has a right to do for legitimate purposes, and he is expending large amounts of the $24,000,000 net profit which he made out of the farmers last year for this infamous propaganda. With not to exceed 60,000,000 bushels on the farm, how are these high prices, which Mr. Barnes now seems to favor, going to benefit the farmer? How are they going to benefit anyone except those who are loaded up with wheat and who expect to make tremendous profits?

I am also going to show to the Senate, from Mr. Barnes's own statement before our committee on October 25—that was the first day of the hearings, and we heard him on another day the next week—where he states positively, and he states again and again, and I said at that time that I found no fault with him, that if he had it in his power not a single bushel of wheat would have been purchased above the guaranteed price.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am interested in knowing the character of the propaganda to which the Senator refers, and I am also interested in knowing the nature of the advertisement carried in the Literary Digest, and what is the purpose of this propaganda, and what may Mr. Barnes hope to accomplish thereby?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but I can see no other result, if the propaganda had been carried out without calling it to the attention not only of the Senate but of the country, than that it would have resulted in abnormally high prices for the stocks which are in the terminal elevators and which are owned by the dealers.

The Senator asks me about the advertisement carried in the Literary Digest. I have it here. The Senator may examine it. It has the picture of an eagle and a sack of flour bearing the label "United States Grain Corporation, standard pure wheat flour," and it reads as follows:

To American flour consumers:

During the war 12,000,000 American housewives pledged by a signed card to follow the suggestions of the Food Administrator, and thereby accomplished marvels in food saving.

Well, everybody knows who the Food Administrator was. Of course, that was Mr. Hoover. That is a splendid advertisement for Mr. Hoover.

I shall not give the name of this writer for the RECORD, but any Senator who wishes to see the letter may do so. The man who sends this to me is the managing editor of a magazine, and this is what he says:

It may interest you to know how the Grain Corporation is squandering the people's money on advertising its cheap flour. Please note the inclosed advertisement just clipped from the Literary Digest. These two pages cost $6,000. The matter embraced in this ad. could well be condensed in half a column. * * * This advertising at the present time is pure waste, if not graft. It will, of course, be taken out of the people who raise wheat and those who buy flour and bread. The Government has no trouble getting all the publicity it needs free; there is no justification for the expenditure of large sums on magazine and periodical publicity.

Yours, truly,

Managing Editor.

Mr. President, if it is the wish of Congress and the wish of the people of the United States that this propaganda shall go on, of course I shall submit to it; I shall have to submit to it; but being charged with the responsibility of the chairmanship of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I feel that it is my duty to let the Senate and the country know the facts.

There were sent to me by a very reliable newspaper man from one of the towns in Indiana two advertisements, which are purely propaganda, sent out by Julius Barnes. One of them is headed "U. S. Grain Corporation, 42 Broadway, New York," and dated Monday, February 9, 1920. I ask that this be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXPORTS OF WHEAT AND WHEAT FLOUR.

Exports of wheat and flour, July 1, 1919, to January 30, 1920, amount to 85,892,000 bushels of wheat and 9,738,000 barrels of flour, making a total equal to 129,715,000 bushels of wheat, compared with 114,633,000 bushels of wheat and 12,580,000 barrels of flour last year to January 30, 1919, making a total equal to 171,241,000 bushels of wheat.

The following is the advertisement referred to in the Literary Digest:

[From the Literary Digest for Jan. 31, 1920.]

UNITED STATES GRAIN CORPORATION STANDARD PURE WHEAT FLOUR.

To American flour consumers: During the war 12,000,000 American housewives pledged by a signed card to follow the suggestions of the Food Administrator and thereby accomplished marvels in food saving.

Since the armistice, and with the relaxation of this effort, the course of food prices, uninfluenced by that former intelligent direction and suggestion, has been such as to indicate either a degeneration of the thrift spirit or inability or unwillingness to correct inequalities of supply and demand.

The United States Grain Corporation, a Government agency, aims to bring to the attention of our people that, as never before in our history, there is the opportunity to practice thrift by individual selection in the purchase of flour.

There is no longer authority to prescribe a uniform method of extraction of flour from the wheat berry as was done during the war. Moreover, except in times of war, the individual preference of our people should be touched lightly, if at all. But that individual preference should be so informed, by accurate information, that it will make its choice with open eyes.

Therefore the Grain Corporation has taken the position that our people should have an opportunity to buy, in the retail stores, lower-priced flour made from the variety of wheat which is in abundant supply.

With this opportunity offered them, they may still prefer to purchase at greater cost that particular quality of flour, highly separated, and requiring for its extraction that variety of wheat from sections where lighter crop yield has caused a higher price.

The clamor of disputants regarding the relative value of various flours from various varieties of wheat has raged for generations, and will always afford a basis for controversy, more or less sincere. But the broad general fact can be stated that those qualities that prove perfectly satisfactory in general household use are found, for peculiar crop reasons this year, in the lower-priced flours. For pastry and cake making the lower-priced flours will be found actually superior. You are the best judge in actual test.

The Grain Corporation prefers that these varieties of flour reach the consumer through the usual trade channels, the mill, the wholesaler, and the retailer, in private trade and outside of the agency of the Grain Corporation. In carrying out, however, its policy of giving the consumer the chance of selection in the practice of thrift, the Grain Corporation is having its export purchases of flour packed in suitable retail packages under the brand "United States Grain Corporation Standard Pure Wheat Flour." In those communities where private trade and individual initiative have not supplied a similar quality and at a similar price we shall induce some retailers to handle this Grain Corporation flour.

Therefore I am justified in advising the American consuming public that this choice now is their; that in retail communities they may buy this perfectly acceptable flour at about $1.50 for the eighth-barrel paper sack or they may pay about $2 or even more for their insistent selections of other special qualities. So far as this enterprise has now progressed, I am confirmed in my belief that a considerable section of our people has not been drawn into an orgy of thoughtless spending as charged against us all, that they value and practice thrift, and thank us for informing them of this opportunity for their choice.

JULIUS H. BARNES,
United States Wheat Director.

For further information write United States Grain Corporation, flour division, 42 Broadway, New York.

Mr. GRONNA. This was sent out under the Government frank.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GRONNA. In just a moment. I have another advertisement, sent me by the same man, headed "Julius H. Barnes, 42 Broadway, New York City. For release immediately—February 7, 1920." I will read part of it:

[1] Decrease.

Julius H. Barnes, United States Wheat Director, last night made public a letter to Senator GRONNA in which he terms the latter's bill for the repeal of the wheat guaranty act and the abolition of the Grain Corporation as a direct repudiation of the pledge made by Congress to the wheat producer for the crop of 1919.

"Senator GRONNA's bill, which yesterday was favorably reported by the Senate Agricultural Committee, repeals all Government control over the price of wheat and requires the Grain Corporation to wind up its affairs without delay."

I shall not take the time to read the rest of it, but I want to read one paragraph. Now, here is the same man who testified before our committee on October 25, and who was so solicitous of the consumer's benefit and so anxious to keep down the price of wheat. Now, listen to what he says in this propaganda:

I warn you and Congress that in the four months yet to go under that guaranty there yet lies the possibility of such a depreciation of value, following the withdrawal of that Government guaranty, that 6,000,000 wheat farmers will ask you by what right you repudiate the pledged national guaranty, on the underlying foundation of which the influence of supply and demand had built an average premium of 30 cents per bushel.

Mr. President, the farmer, as I have said, has a very small amount in store on the farm, although Mr. Barnes states in this letter:

Two hundred million bushels of wheat still remain on the farms, and 200,000,000 bushels additional in the channels between farm and consumer, all of it relying on the pledged faith of this Government that, if necessary, the National Treasury stands behind its purchase at the guaranty level. That security your bill proposes to terminate, and that termination will cause apprehension with every farmer, with every dealer, with every miller, with every flour handler, with every baker, and with every banker. The withdrawal of that underlying security will destroy the trade methods which have furnished a ready daily market to the producer at a farm price for wheat 200 per cent higher than the prewar level—

Which is not true, because wheat was $3.07 in Minneapolis the day we enacted the law, and the farmer has never received, on an average, that price. He has never received that price.

Yet protected the consumer by a bread advance of only 75 per cent—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I could furnish a great many of these advertisements and a great deal of this propaganda which Mr. Barnes is sending out, but I neither want to take the time of the Senate unduly nor do I want to burden the RECORD.

Mr. GORE. It is all published free.

Mr. GRONNA. It is published, of course; I do not know whether it is free or paid for.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I understood that the representations made before the committee with regard to price fixing by the Food Administrator were to the effect that it was to be a minimum price, and afterwards that it was used as a maximum price. Is that true?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, Mr. President. Of course, those are really two questions. I see a number of Senators here who are members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, among them the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator's colleague, who was chairman of the committee at that time, and I believe I am stating the facts when I say that it was understood by the committee that this was simply a minimum price; that it would not be used as a maximum price.

Mr. OWEN. Was it not so represented to the committee by Mr. Hoover?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Hoover stated again and again that he did not want a maximum price; he simply wanted a minimum price.

Mr. OWEN. And do I understand that afterwards he used this as a maximum price?

Mr. GRONNA. He did, in this way——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it has not been used as a maximum price this year.

Mr. GRONNA. I think I shall cover that, if the Senator will permit me. The same section of the food act not only fixes the minimum guaranteed price at $2 a bushel, but it authorizes the President to fix a higher price, to fix a price which will stimulate production, and, as the law recites, which will be a fair price, and which will give the farmer a profit. The President, acting on the advice of his associates—and he did all that any President or any other man could possibly do—appointed a fair-price committee, and on that committee were representative men; but undoubtedly, Mr. President, the influence of Mr. Hoover was felt, and the first price fixed by the President of the United States was $2.21, I believe, in Minneapolis. The prices varied throughout the terminal markets, but on an average, I think, the price was about $2.10 or $2.15. Now, that was an absolute maximum price, and that price prevailed during the war, so that the farmer had to sell his wheat to the elevators on the basis of that price.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. That price was fixed by the President himself. Mr. Barnes had nothing whatever to do with it. He was not even Food Administrator at the time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not want to dispute the words of my good friend from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I went to see the President myself, and so did the Senator from North Dakota, and urged him to fix a higher price than $2.21 or $2.20.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I am sure the Senator did that.

Mr. KELLOGG. We did everything we could, but the President himself fixed it at $2.20.

Mr. GRONNA. There is no misunderstanding between the Senator from Minnesota and myself with reference to the wheat question. I think we have agreed on every proposition affecting the farmer and affecting the consumer. I believe, however, that Mr. Hoover's influence had a great deal to do with the fixing of this maximum price.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from North Dakota will remember that Mr. Hoover stated before the Agricultural Committee that the fixing of an absolute or maximum price had failed during the war in Europe wherever it had been tried, and he said there were a good many illusions in connection with the food bill then pending, and that one of those illusions was the fear among the farmers that it would be used to fix a maximum or absolute price. He said there was no foundation for such an illusion. Instead of an illusion, it turned out to be a fact, a very grim fact, and a very expensive fact.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that matter. I remember very well that Mr. Hoover stated to our committee, just as the Senator has said, that a maximum price had not worked well in European countries, and he thought it was best for us to fix only a minimum price, and I believe that every Member of this body so understood it when the law was passed. As I said a moment ago, I do not think any farmer or anyone else can find any fault with the law. The law was passed with the intention of seeing that justice was done the farmer in case there should be a slump in the price of wheat, but it was not intended that the market price—the actual price prevailing—should be taken away from the farmer; but that was done during the war, and the farmers have not complained. They said: "It was a war measure. We are willing to make sacrifices. We gave our boys freely, and we certainly are willing to give this product to the American Government." That is what the farmers said; and let me say, in answer to my friend the Senator from Minnesota, that it is true that during last year—1919—beginning with July 1, wheat was higher in the markets than the guaranteed price, but the advance was nominal. It was only a small advance. The advance came after most of the grain had been marketed by the farmer, and after it came into the possession of the dealer.

In the first place, Mr. Barnes is mistaken in his letter when he states that it will be a repudiation of the contracts with the millers and bakers and with others, because section 2 of my bill provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That the repeal and termination of authority effected by section 1 of this act shall not affect any act done, or any right or obligation accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said repeal or termination of authority; but all rights and liabilities under such acts of August 10, 1917, and March 4, 1919, arising before such repeal or termination of authority shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if such act of March 4, 1919, had not been repealed or the authority conferred by such act of August 10, 1917, had not been terminated.

Mr. President, even a farmer—and I might say even a schoolboy—would not make the statement that the bill affects contracts made by the grain director with any of the people engaged in these various industries. There is no repudiation. Speaking for myself and, I believe, speaking also for the committee, it was understood that no contracts should be affected and no contracts would be affected under the provisions of the bill. It was not the intention to repeal the minimum guaranty. I believe that was the unanimous opinion of the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. If I am mistaken in that, I trust that some Senators who are now present and who are members of that committee will correct me. It was the intention to stop the activities of Julius Barnes, who is acting not only as grain director but, as I am informed, is acting for and managing the campaign of our friend, the greatest internationalist and imperialist of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have an ungovernable curiosity to have the gentleman identified by name. Would the Senator gratify me?

Mr. GRONNA. I can only state what I believe and what I understand. I understand that Mr. Barnes is the manager for Mr. Hoover, who is a receptive candidate for the humble office of President of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I have understood correctly, he has not yet decided in which party he will be a candidate. Can the Senator throw any light upon any probable affiliation of his that would indicate that?

Mr. GRONNA. My only information with respect to that is that I find in the Blue Book of the country from whence he came a statement wherein he first gives his residence and then it is stated that he is a Liberal.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a party which is found only in England. There the parties are the Liberal, the Radical, the Conservative or Union Party, and probably a fourth one.

Mr. GRONNA. I can only answer the Senator's question by asking him another question. Does the Senator from Illinois believe that it is an impossibility that we may have a Liberal Party in this country?

Mr. SHERMAN. That depends entirely upon the developments in the next few months in this Chamber.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator.

I desire to say for the RECORD that I have nothing but the kindliest feeling for Mr. Hoover personally; I have nothing but the kindliest feeling for Mr. Barnes personally; but when it comes to the question of electing a President of the United States, although my ancestors came from a foreign country, I am enough an American to require that whoever is elected President of the United States shall be 100 per cent American and a citizen of the United States, and who believes in the traditions of the fathers of our country.

Why did the fathers of our country in our Constitution provide that no citizen of the country could become President of the United States unless he was born in the United States? Was not that for the very purpose of requiring that the man who might become President of the United States should be imbued with American ideas and ideals? Was it not for the very purpose, I ask, that no foreigner should become President, and no native-born citizen entertaining a friendlier feeling, and also a suggestion that no native-born citizen manifesting loyalty to any country except our own should be our President, no matter from what country his ancestors came, because the President of the United States must and shall be not an internationalist but an American?

Mr. President, it is possible for men who are born in this country to be internationalists and imperialists. I would not vote for a man whose ideas are such that he would sacrifice as much for a foreign country as he would for his own, even if he was born in this country. I would not, Mr. President, vote for a man on my own party's ticket who shared this international imperialistic idea. I am free to state that if the Republican Party nominates such a man, I shall vote for the Democratic nominee, provided he shares my views and not the views and ideas of an internationalist.

Mr. President, here is some more propaganda, a circular headed "The Duluth Board of Trade, secretary's office," and then in large letters "Important." I shall not take the time of the Senate to read it. It simply calls attention to the fact that a bill introduced and championed by me was favorably reported, and it calls the attention of the grain dealers to the disastrous effect upon the price of wheat that the bill will have in reducing the price of wheat. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE DULUTH BOARD OF TRADE,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE.

IMPORTANT.

The Agricultural Committee of the United States Senate, on the urgent representations of Senator GRONNA, of North Dakota, has recommended for passage a bill to discontinue the United States Grain Corporation, and thereby remove the Government guaranteed minimum prices on spring and durum wheat.

Wheat stocks on farms and in country elevators at the present time total 300,000,000 bushels; railroad facilities are inadequate for its transportation to terminal markets; banks are calling loans and advancing interest rates; the cash price in terminal markets has declined 50 to 75 cents from maximum prices, and in the face of this most serious situation, legislation is proposed to destroy the Government's minimum-price guaranty and to take away from the farmer and country grain dealer their only protection and their only safeguard against much greater declines in the value of their wheat.

There is nothing in the present law to prevent advances over the Government basic prices when conditions of supply and demand warrant them, but the law, which this new bill seeks to shelve, guarantees that prices will not decline below the fixed minimum prices, regardless of lower world markets or the general laws of supply and demand.

This proposed action takes away something you need and gives nothing in return; it strikes at the very vitals of the prosperity of the Northwest, and it must not be allowed to prevail.

We urge you to communicate at once by wire or letter with your Congressmen and Senators protesting most vigorously against the dissolution of the United States Grain Corporation and its guaranteed minimum prices, which have but four months longer to run, and requesting them to do their utmost to prevent the passage of such drastic and destructive legislation.

DULUTH GRAIN COMMISSION MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION.

FEBRUARY 7, 1920.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I feel compelled to refer to the printed hearings of October 25, 1919. I first wish to refer to the embargo on wheat, which is found on pages 4 and 5 of the hearings. These are Mr. Barnes's own statements. I take it he will not deny them, because they are already in print. He said:

As to the export embargo, the first question asked, naturally, is as to whether it is necessary. I call attention to the fact that it is a continuation of the embargo which has been effective for two years under the War Trade Board policies. That was continued by a proclamation by the President, dated June 24, 1919, effective July 1, and transferred from the control of the War Trade Board to that of the Wheat Director.

The authority for an export and import embargo is specific in the act of March 4, and on date of June 24 there were every reason why that import and export embargo should be continued, against the enormous crop promise given in the June crop report, at that time promising 1,234,000,000 bushels in the United States, which has since sunk in actual yield to 918,000,000.

He admits here that his estimate was only 918,000,000, and in his own report he gives it as 943,000,000.

I find on page 6 of the printed committee hearings the following:

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose was, of course, to keep the price of food down, was it not?

Mr. BARNES. It was to avoid information which might lead to speculation that would advance the cost of food, rather than the fear of the underlying economic effects, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, would it not have been natural that wheat should have advanced?

Mr. BARNES. You are asking my opinion? I say, no; I do not believe it. I think the difficulties in transportation and in international finance are such that the elimination of these embargoes would probably add not one cent.

Mr. President, even great men make mistakes. We know now from the most reliable authority that he was mistaken on that, because I shall have printed and attached to the hearings a chart which will show, beyond a question of doubt, that the embargo must have affected the price, because wheat advanced 65 cents a bushel between the time when the embargo was announced and some time during December. So, with all due respect to Mr. Barnes, his judgment is not infallible.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator should say in fairness to Mr. Barnes that the embargo was placed on wheat by the President and not by Mr. Barnes.

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct. I will come to that later, but that is true. I agree with the Senator. If I do not happen to find it in the hearings, I also want it understood that Mr. Barnes advised the President against placing the embargo on grain. That is true. Certainly I do not wish to do Mr. Barnes an injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. What about the Scandinavian countries? They tried to buy wheat from us?

Mr. BARNES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They have plenty of money?

Mr. BARNES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They have as much gold in proportion to population as we have. I know that, because I made an investigation. They had to go to the Argentine and buy wheat, did they not?

Mr. BARNES. Yes. But these purchases at this time would not have been 5 per cent of all exports that have occurred.

I simply want to say that if there is any danger that the Government of the United States would lose any money on the guaranty, we should have thrown our markets open when those neutrals came here to our ports with their gold, with their own ships, and begged us for wheat. They were turned down. I know that one foreign country, one of the neutrals, wanted to buy 5,000,000 bushels of wheat, and they had the gold and the ships, and they had to go to Argentina to buy their wheat. But Mr. Barnes stated, as I shall read—because I prefer to read his own words—that his primary interest was in keeping the price down, in accordance with the instructions of the President of the United States and his message, which I believe is printed in the hearings, and which I shall read later on.

I will read a little further, on page 6, from Mr. Barnes's testimony:

Senator GORE. Then, in your judgment, there would not have been any substantial probability that the price of wheat would have advanced?

That is, provided the embargo was removed.

Mr. BARNES. That is my personal judgment.

Senator GORE. It could not have declined in this country so far as the farmer is concerned on account of the guaranty?

Mr. BARNES. It would not decline below the guaranty; no.

Senator GORE. If it had declined in foreign countries below the guaranty, then you could have observed the difference and sold to the American consumer at the reduced world price, could you not?

Mr. BARNES. Yes.

Mr. President, is it not clear that if the price of wheat did go below the guaranteed price it was possible for the grain director to buy wheat, pay the farmer the guaranteed price, and sell it to the miller at a reduced price, and in that way benefit the consumer? That is his own admission, and we know that it is true.

Senator GORE. Then the only probable effect, according to your view, would have been a decline in the price of bread in this country.

Now, listen to this:

Mr. BARNES. No, Senator; that does not quite follow—

I agree with him absolutely—because there might have been the danger that with further exporting particular trades in this country would absorb enough wheat to produce a vigorous business, or the farmers, being encouraged to hold back their crop, might have forced it.

That is his own answer, and it is unnecessary for me to comment on it.

Senator GORE. Then there would have been a probability of the farmer getting more for his wheat if you had let him take whatever price it commanded in the market?

Mr. BARNES. Of course, it does that to-day; he is getting the guaranteed price.

This was on October 25, 1919.

Senator GORE. But if local conditions and demand had carried the price still higher——

Mr. BARNES. My feeling is it would not have added a cent par, and probably would not have resulted in any advance whatever in wheat.

Senator NORRIS. As I understand it, you had practically made preparations to remove this embargo and changed the order of things after consultation with the President. Did you think the President was right in that and you were wrong? Did he convince you?

Mr. BARNES. I felt that the President was perfectly justified under the provisions of the act, which give as a correlative purpose to enable the people of the United States to produce wheat products at a reasonable price. If his advisers convinced him that there was a danger of it, I felt it might well be decided in his judgment.

Senator NORRIS. As I understand it, you had taken steps to remove the embargo by the calling of this meeting, and that was all canceled after you had conferred with the President. Did you change your mind after consultation with him?

Mr. BARNES. No, Senator NORRIS. Let me make it clear that the President first agreed with me as to the advisability of taking off these embargoes, and then upon the presentation that the whole condition of the country and the high cost of living were so acute, after consultation with various advisers—

He does not say who the "advisers" were, but I will bet dollars to doughnuts that one of them was Hoover.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was not Mr. Barnes, because, as the Senator knows, he opposed it.

Mr. GRONNA. I am speaking of the "advisers."

Mr. KELLOGG. I say that Mr. Barnes was not one of the "advisers," because he advised the President to have the embargo taken off.

Mr. GRONNA. The testimony continues—he wrote the decision that it was not wise to exercise his discretion.

Senator NORRIS. And you agreed with him in that?

Mr. BARNES. I did.

Senator NORRIS. And you and the President reached that conclusion because you were afraid if you took off the embargo it would increase the cost of living, were you not?

Mr. BARNES. That was a possibility, and the result if it had developed would be serious.

Senator NORRIS. Exactly; I understand that. The only way it could have increased the cost of living would have been by increasing the price of wheat?

Mr. BARNES. Yes.

Senator NORRIS. So, as a matter of fact, you discontinued the action you had taken toward removing the embargo because, in your judgment, after consultation with the President and in the President's judgment, it would have increased the cost of wheat?

Mr. BARNES. No.

Senator NORRIS. Then in that way would it have increased the cost of living?

Mr. BARNES. I say the possibility that it might so operate, it being impossible to forecast its actual results, was sufficiently serious to warrant the President in that action.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] goes on to say that he does not criticize the President, and no member of the committee seemed to be inclined to criticize the President because he imposed the embargo.

However, Mr. President, if it were necessary to place an embargo upon grain at the time it was in the farmers' hands, or at the time it was upon the farm, why was it necessary after that food product had practically flowed into the channels of trade to remove the embargo? That seems to me to be rather a serious question. The embargo was not removed until the 15th day of November or December, if I am correctly informed, and from that time wheat advanced 55 cents a bushel in the Minneapolis market.

Mr. KELLOGG. On the 15th of December the embargo was removed.

Mr. GRONNA. I have been told it was removed on the 15th of November, but possibly I am mistaken.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think it was on the 15th of December.

Mr. GRONNA. With all this alarm, Mr. President, with all this tremendous propaganda since this bill was introduced and, indeed, before it was introduced, I believe that during the month of December and during the month of January, when there was a limited supply of wheat in the farmers' hands, and a much larger supply in the country elevators, there was an effort not to furnish cars and for the banks not to extend the loans to the farmers or to the grain-elevator men; there was a concerted effort to force onto the markets whatever wheat the farmer had left, and there was also an effort to force the small grain men to ship their supplies to the terminals and to sell it at as low a price as possible. That is my belief, and I have as much right to my belief and to express it as has Mr. Barnes to say that that was not the purpose.

Mr. President, I took occasion to telegraph to a dealer in Minneapolis, a reliable man, whom I personally know, and I asked the closing prices of wheat and flour on yesterday. I have here his reply. It is a very brief telegram addressed to me, and is as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

No. 1 dark northern, $3.05. Best patent flour, $14, in cotton bags.

He signs his name to the telegram.

This man has been in business there for 45 years. With all this tremendous propaganda, Mr. President, for no other purpose, as I see it, than to make a raid upon the product which the farmer might have left, and the amount of wheat in store in the small country elevators, and also for the purpose of discrediting this bill, in the face of this tremendous propaganda wheat must have advanced 20 cents a bushel on yesterday, because I received a telegram day before yesterday quoting the closing price of wheat at Minneapolis at $2.85 a bushel. So it seems to me that Mr. Barnes's fear of the tremendous reduction in the price of wheat is unfounded.

It may seem strange to Senators to be informed that the people in the West have to buy wheat; that we do not always sell wheat. Take the State of Montana, take the western half of the two Dakotas, and the people there have to buy more wheat for seed than there actually is in the State of North Dakota to-day.

I am deeply interested in their welfare, as I am in the welfare of the consumers generally. I do not want to see wheat during the next few months go to $4 or $5 a bushel, because that would be an injustice to the public; it would be an injustice to the farmer; it would have a ruinous effect upon the great industry of agriculture. All we ask, Mr. President, is a fair price. It would be only the well-to-do farmers in the western section of the country—those who have been able to hold their wheat—who would receive any benefit whatever from a greatly increased price. The vast number of farmers throughout my section and throughout Montana and the Western States generally would lose large sums of money by an abnormal price which might reach, as I have said, $4 or $5 a bushel.

Mr. Barnes said in his letter to me—and I know he sent a similar letter to all Senators; at least, I believe he has done so—that it was supreme egoism to predict what the price might be. I am surprised that a student should make such a statement. He ought to know, as every Member who has studied the situation does know, what the facts regarding this matter are. I have had the information printed in the hearings, showing the acreage, the production, and the price of wheat throughout the entire world. I should like to debate the question here or anywhere else whether or not there is a shortage of wheat throughout the world, and I should like to debate it with Mr. Barnes or with Mr. Hoover.

Of course, if the reports which I have here are not correct, then I am mistaken; but they are the most reliable reports obtainable. There are only three countries throughout the world where wheat sells any cheaper or where the price was fixed as low as it was in the United States. That may also interest Senators. It will be remembered that when the President of the United States delivered his first message during the present Congress he said wheat was cheaper in the United States than anywhere else, and that it was intended to continue to keep it cheaper. I am not criticizing the President, because he is interested in the great mass of the people. I have his statement here in print, and ask that I may include it in the RECORD without reading, in order that I may not misquote the President's statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Wheat shipments and credits to facilitate the purchase of all wheat can and will be limited and controlled in such a way as not to raise but rather lower the price of flour here. The Government has the power, within certain limits, to regulate that. We can not deny wheat to foreign peoples who are in dire need of it, and we do not wish to do so; but, fortunately, though the wheat crop is not what we hoped it would be, it is abundant if handled with provident care. The price of wheat is lower in the United States than in Europe, and can with proper management be kept so.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it seems that it is very difficult for me to make myself so plain that Mr. Barnes can understand me. I realize that I am not so familiar with the technicalities of the grain trade as is Mr. Barnes. I know that Mr. Barnes has for a quarter of a century been the largest exporter of wheat in this country; I know that there is nothing known to the grain trade that Mr. Barnes does not know, but I also know that at one time—not when he was an officer of the Government—he was successful in cornering the wheat in the Great Lakes section of the country and was reported to have made millions of dollars. I am familiar with the situation; I have lived in the West all my life and generally have kept my eyes open.

I shall continue to read from Mr. Barnes's testimony, because I prefer to read from his own statements. We went into the question of ocean rates. I shall not dwell upon that now only to say that it is fair to presume that the ocean rates are much lower than they were during the war. I wish to read a paragraph or two from Mr. Barnes's statement to show what the rates were before the war.

Senator SMITH of South Carolina. Do you know what the prewar rates were to these points?

Referring to certain points in Europe—

Mr. BARNES. No; I have only a general idea. Of course, the prewar rates were very low compared with these rates.

He was giving the rates at that time as 22 cents and 27 cents a bushel—

The tramp rate the year the war broke out, 1914, from Atlantic ports to ordinary destinations abroad, Great Britain or northern Europe, about 6 cents per bushel.

Senator SMITH of South Carolina. That is about what I thought—against about eighty something now.

Mr. BARNES. Yes. In reading this record of British rates into the record I would like to make this comment, that these rates were obtained by me on confidential information some time ago, and there may have been moderate advances since.

I shall not put the rates in, because he said they were given to him confidentially, but it is fair to presume if European countries could afford to pay the prices obtaining for wheat at that time, in addition to the abnormally high freight rates, that they could afford to pay more now, with much reduced rates, providing they can afford to buy it at all.

Now, I want to show the movements of wheat from the farms. That is on pages 12 and 13. I begin reading from the top of page 12.

Continuing, Mr. Barnes says:

On the general question of the position of wheat in the Southwest, I do want to emphasize this, that we have accurate information. Never before has there been a commercial information collection such as we maintain, by the survey of weekly reports from 7,200 mills and 21,000 grain dealers under license. They are required to report each week their receipts of wheat from the farms, their shipments, and their stocks on hand at the end of the week. That is compiled in that weekly statement which I have given you—that large statement which looks quite formidable, but is really quite simple when you examine it.

Senator OWEN. I think that is a very important statement, because men have been challenging the accuracy of these statements and I think perhaps Members of the Senate have felt that there was some inaccuracy.

Mr. BARNES. I have no hesitation in saying that they are absolutely correct.

Senator OWEN. So far as humanly possible?

Mr. BARNES. So far as humanly possible. They are made on certified statements each week.

Senator NORRIS. That includes practically all of the grain dealers in the United States, does it not?

Mr. BARNES. Every one.

Senator NORRIS. So that it is complete in itself?

Mr. BARNES. Yes. Of course, when I say that, Senator, you must remember that we have 21,000 country merchants, and you know the practice of some of them as to bookkeeping and records. There may be some error in their records, but it must be very slight.

The CHAIRMAN. You have reference now, Mr. Barnes, to your statement of prices?

Mr. BARNES. No; I have reference to statistics of the amount of mill production, etc.

If you will refer to the statement which I have given you which starts with "Receipts from farms," I would like to go over with you the four statements made in the resolution.

This was a resolution introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma, complaint having been made that the wheat in Texas and Oklahoma was rotting on the ground because they were not furnished cars, and at the very time the complaint was made that there were no terminal facilities on the seaboard; and at that very time Mr. Barnes refused to sell this grain to the foreign countries; refused to sell it to the people who came there with their own ships.

Referring to that you will see that in Colorado the receipts from the farms since the beginning of this crop year have been 8,267,000 bushels, against 7,155,000 bushels for the same period of last year.

I do not need to read those columns in detail, but if you will go to the fourth column you will see that of the crop this year there has been sold from the farms, using the last Government estimate as to the amount of wheat raised by that State, in Colorado 50.5 per cent; Kansas, 53.5; Oklahoma, 75.2; Texas, 66.5.

It shows how easy it is to handle figures. At this time Mr. Barnes was denying that the people of Oklahoma and of Texas were suffering from want of cars. He was showing that 75 per cent of the crop of Oklahoma had already left the farms, and that sixty-odd per cent had left the farms in Texas; but, Mr. President, three or four months later on, the amount in the farmers' hands must have increased, and yet we have not produced another crop; and if I wanted to take the time of the Senate I could show where hundreds of millions of bushels have flowed into the terminals since that time. There must be a mistake somewhere.

I know this is tiresome to the Members of the Senate, but I deem it of considerable importance, because it concerns the people throughout the entire country with reference to a product which is the most important food product in our country.

Now, let us see how many million bushels were shipped from the farm on the 24th day of October. This is even before the 25th of October. I think it was the 1st of October, if I am not mistaken—

Senator SMITH of South Carolina. How does that—

Speaking of the statement—

compare with this year, Mr. Barnes?

Mr. BARNES. Column 1 gives the movement this year and column 2 gives the movement for the same period last year. That shows that 491,831,000 bushels have left the farms in the United States this year as against 467,074,000 last year.

Senator MCNARY. And that 731,061,000 is for the year before?

Mr. BARNES. That is for the entire 12 months of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you the totals for all the States anywhere?

Mr. BARNES. Yes; the final footing, Senator, at the bottom.

The CHAIRMAN. That includes the States you give, but you do not give all the States.

He simply calls attention to the fact that it is given by zones. I shall not burden the RECORD with this statement, because I expect to have quite a number of these reports printed, and I shall send them to Senators who may desire them.

The CHAIRMAN. I observe that the shipments from the Minnesota zone were much heavier last year than this year, Mr. Barnes?

Mr. BARNES. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is 65,000,000 this year as against 129,000,000 last year.

Mr. BARNES. Of course, that is due to the partial crop failure in certain sections of that zone this year.

Now, I want to call the attention of Senators to this. Mr. Barnes says:

This is interesting. The Department of Agriculture, as a result of an experience of years, have arrived at a rate of marketing of the crop each month in the year as the normal rate of marketing from the farm. Applying that to this year's crop, 84,000,000 bushels more have left the farm in 3½ months than the theoretical rate of marketing.

That was Mr. Barnes's statement on October 25—that 84,000,000 bushels more had left the farms this year than any previous year, and I believe it is true, because the season was unfavorable with reference to spring wheat. We had a drought, we had hot winds, and the crop ripened, and was harvested prematurely. It simply goes to show that there was no such amount of wheat on the farms as Mr. Barnes now wants to show there is, and I challenge contradiction of the figures which I present to the Senate.

Senator GORE. Do you think the guaranteed price has stimulated that?

Mr. BARNES. Undoubtedly.

Senator GORE. The fact that there is no reason to hold in anticipation of an advance?

Mr. BARNES. Undoubtedly, Senator, that has had a good deal of effect.

Mr. Barnes admits that the farmers did not hope to get any more than practically the guaranteed price. He admits in his own statement here that the guaranty had much to do with the early marketing of the farmers' grain. The farmers did not anticipate that all these arrangements were to be made later on which would enhance the price of the product which they sold, and upon which many of them sustained a heavy loss. But, Mr. President, it is different when the farmers in the larger cities get the crop, when the terminal elevators get it; and I want to say that there are some farmers in the cities who farm the farmer and not the soil. I only wish they would go to the farm and farm, and not continually prey not only upon the consumers but upon the farmers. If Mr. Barnes has proved anything with his propaganda, he is proving right now that the farmer is helpless, that he is in the hands of speculators, that it will be necessary for the Government of the United States to take the farmer under its wings and further guarantee a price. That is what he is proving. He is proving that the farmer is absolutely helpless, and can not maintain a price which is profitable to himself and which will enable him to carry on the great industry of agriculture; yet he is very solicitous about the farmers now. He says this bill is an effort to repudiate contracts. I have read section 2 of the bill, which provides specifically that it shall not interfere either with contracts made by Mr. Barnes or by anyone who may have contracts now dealing in grain or in flour, in wheat or in wheat products.

Mr. Barnes ought to know that according to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture the winter wheat has been reduced from 50,000,000 acres in 1918 and 1919 to 38,000,000 acres which was seeded to winter wheat last fall. Does that indicate that the price paid to the farmer was a profitable or an abnormally high price? It bears out the statement I have made and which I repeat, that the farmers broke up their pastures, and they seeded old ground which was not fit for grain, because they wanted to raise every bushel possible, because we were in a tremendous war. They did it with the help of old men who had retired from the farms; they did it with the help of old women who, with bended backs and toiling from early morning until late at night, produced this crop. They did it with the help of young girls who never before had soiled their hands with work of this kind. Now we are going to be ruled by an autocrat, ruled by this man, because we have established an agency making it possible for him to act in an autocratic manner, and use this $1,000,000,000 of appropriation and $50,000,000 which he has made in profits. If the American people want that, they are welcome to it. I am going to criticize it, and I am going to say that I do not approve of it.

I want to say, for the benefit of Mr. Barnes, that in his statement here he advocates getting back to private business. He says it will take some time for private business to reknit. I agree with him. I was following the suggestion which he made before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on October 25 and later. I was trying to help him; but if arrangements have been made by men named by the President, whether they are in high places or low places, I care not, if I desired to be reelected to office, if I never receive a single, solitary vote, I am not going to indorse a proposition of this sort, because it is unjust, it is unfair, it is wrong.

I want to read a few paragraphs, however, just to show that I am not misquoting Mr. Barnes in stating that he has all the time advocated a low price for wheat up to this time. Why Mr. Barnes has taken this thing to heart and changed I do not know, and I might say I do not care, because it is certainly not in the interest of the consumer nor is it in the interest of the producer or the farmer. All this propaganda which I have offered here is said to be carried on for the benefit of the farmer. The farmer must be a miserable creature and very helpless. Everybody is working for him; everybody is assisting him, from the Wall Street gambler down to a farmer Senator from an agricultural State; we are all working for the farmer, and still that poor creature is unable to succeed. Do you wonder why the farm boys and the farm girls leave the farm and go to the large cities? Those who have an opportunity to get an education certainly will not remain on the farm at the niggardly returns they are receiving and which the farmer is being paid. I am speaking now of the man who farms and I am not speaking of the laborer, because farm labor has increased 300 to 400 per cent in my State, and I think that is probably true in the State of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I used to hire men for $25 a month and board and washing, and now I am paying men as high as $100 a month and have to furnish them an automobile to go to town whenever they feel like it.

I wish to call attention briefly to the Government price of wheat in foreign countries. In 1919 in Canada at the time this report was printed the price of wheat was $2.25—the Canadian Government has since increased it, I think, 24½ or 25 cents, making it either $2.49½ or $2.50, which of course would be a higher price than the guaranteed price in the United States—Bohemia, $2.92; France, $3.83; Germany, $2.92; Italy, soft wheat, $3.68, hard wheat, $4.20 a bushel; Roumania, $5.25 a bushel; Spain, $2.52 a bushel; Switzerland, $3.15 a bushel; Algeria, $2.63; Tunis, $2.15; Australia, $1.05 guaranteed price to the farmers—it does not say that that is the export price, but simply states that is the price guaranteed to the farmer—New Zealand, $2.58.

Mr. President, you will see from the report, if the report is correct, that my statement is absolutely correct, and the President's statement is absolutely correct. Outside of these three small countries wheat sells much higher in all of the European countries and the European farmer receives a much higher price. Let me say to you that these prices are at par; they are not prices in their own money, but they are at par with our money, because these reports clearly so indicate.

Mr. President, I shall read only a few telegrams. I have received many of them. I have not had the time to count them, but I have received a great many. I received a number this morning, and I wish to read one from Nashua, Minn., as follows:

NASHUA, MINN., February 13.

Senator ASLE J. GRONNA,
Washington:

In signing agreement with Grain Corporation we expect protection with quantity wheat in elevator. Owing to no cars for two months this appeal means great loss.

FARMERS' ELEVATOR CO.

I find no fault with those people. It is perfectly natural that they want to be protected if they paid a higher price.

I do not know whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] was in the Chamber a moment ago when I stated that wheat sold at $3.05 in the markets of Minneapolis yesterday, which indicates that even with this tremendous propaganda that is carried on wheat is advancing again. I can see no possible danger of wheat going down anywhere near the price—either the minimum price or the guaranteed price—fixed by the President. Three dollars and five cents is a dollar and five cents a bushel higher than the minimum guaranteed price; and as the maximum price is $2.26, it is 79 cents higher than the fixed price.

I have another telegram here, dated February 13, reading as follows:

The Grain Corporation, through the various channels which they have at their disposal, have started propaganda asking that a flood of telegrams be sent to Washington protesting against your bill to various concerns and individuals. This propaganda is possible because the impression has been left that it is the intention of your bill to repudiate all outstanding contracts. I do not believe that one out of every thousand individuals who send telegrams on this bill have ever read or know what the bill covers. We believe your bill is absolutely the solution of the tactics that have been followed by the Grain Corporation.

That is rather a good indorsement, Mr. President. They are evidently familiar with the practices of the Grain Corporation.

Here is another telegram received this morning from Lewiston, Mont. I call attention to this because this is from a section of the country where they had a drought for three years, and where they had to buy wheat for feed and for seed; but this propaganda even reaches into Montana. Every Montana farmer, every citizen of Montana, would be benefited by a lower price of wheat, and yet this is what this flour-milling concern telegraphs me:

If any measure is enacted impairing protection afforded us under Grain Corporation contract guaranteeing price of wheat, it will work great injustice to Montana mills. Owing to short crops, we have of necessity made commitments in milling wheat sufficient to meet needs to June 1. Earnestly urge that this protection be neither withdrawn nor impaired.

This man is honest about it. He does not say that he is doing it for the farmer. He says he is doing it for himself for his milling corporation; and if Mr. Barnes had not misconstrued the bill, if he had told the truth, that section 2 of the bill safeguarded absolutely all of these contracts, there would have been no need for this honest man to go to the expense of sending the telegram.

I want to say right here that I know of no bill against which propaganda on such a huge scale has been carried on, except the bill introduced by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], known as the packers' bill, and which the committee reported out this morning—of course, amended and not in its original form.

It simply goes to show that those who have the money can make it very uncomfortable for those who are servants in this Chamber and in the other branch of Congress if we step on the toes of certain interests.

I realize, I think, to some extent that this is a representative Government. I realize that it is a man's duty, if he is a Member of either this body or the other body of Congress, to carry out the will of his people; but if it shall come to pass that every Member must become spineless, that he shall not have the right to use his judgment when he is in a position to know the facts, and if it has come about that, through corporations or other agencies—I care not whether they are individual corporations or agencies of the Government—if it is come to pass that we must legislate to please the propagandists, then God save the country!

Here is another telegram which I wish to read. I want to give the name of this party, because I do not think Mr. Barnes could reach it—this is a farm organization. It comes from the secretary of a great organization in the great State of Indiana. I am going to read it and give the town and the date and the name of the party who sent it:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., February 13, 1929.

A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Following telegram sent to Barnes: "Your telegram February 6. You compelled our farmers to accept Government minimum price for wheat as maximum price and allowed dealers and millers unreasonable handling charge of 5 cents per bushel over our protest. We believe consumers should buy flour based on price received by farmers for wheat plus reasonable profit to handlers. You could compel this by using methods imposed on us. We resent treatment received from Grain Corporation and will advocate its discontinuance unless price of flour reflects price received by farmer for wheat. The only danger we fear is condition of European exchange."

INDIANA FEDERATION OF FARMERS' ASSOCIATIONS, LEWIS TAYLOR, General Secretary.

I was glad to receive that this morning, because I have been traveling in rather unpleasant company for the last few days. I have been flooded with these telegrams, from good people, of course. Many of them are misinformed; some of them, I think, are more interested in the profits which they have in the stock of wheat than they are in either the consumer or the producer. As one man telegraphed me from Minneapolis, "I told them they are only losing part of their tremendous profits, and that there is no actual loss out of their pockets," and I think that is largely the condition with these terminal elevators.

There is only one way to solve this question, and that is for the farmers to do exactly like all other business men do—to control their own products, to own their elevators, to own their terminal elevators, and, if necessary, to own their flouring mills, and then stop this tremendous difference between the price to the producer and the selling price to the consumer. I do not want the Government of the United States to do it. I want the farmers to go into it and to handle their business the same as other business men go into business for themselves.

Talk about the danger of exchange! I have here a letter from a man in New York, whose name, I think, is Clark, president of one of the largest banks in New York, calling attention to the fact that the demand for leather goods from Europe has decreased, and, after he had conferred with the shoe men, he states that the shoe men were of the opinion that the price of shoes would still further advance.

There is quite a different thing when it does not affect the farmer's product. Has it affected the price of shoes? Has it affected the price of lumber? Has it affected the price of farm machinery? Has it affected the price of anything that the farmer buys except when he buys his own product back, manufactured flour at a higher price or if he happens to buy a package of crackers or a few cookies, or something of that sort, if he can afford it? Has it affected anything like that, I say? I was wondering how long we shall continue to be a government of men and not a government of law. Any man who has taken this matter seriously must admit that the condition is not as it ought to be. Why are you afraid of conditions? Is there not the same amount of money and more in the country than there ever was? Are the people in the country not just as loyal and as willing to go ahead and produce as they were before? So, what are you afraid of? Why hamper and hamstring the industries of the country? Why scare the farmer; why drive the farmer into all this unnecessary trouble and expense? The soil will produce in the future as it has in the past. All we have to do is to cultivate it. All we have to do is to do away with some of these associations, governmental or otherwise, abolish some of these agencies which, to my mind, are an absolute detriment to every industry of the country and to the people of the country generally. It is about time that the Senate of the United States and every Member of Congress should act on his own initiative. Let him find out what are the best interests of the people and then act upon his own judgment regardless of what propaganda may be carried on either for or against the measure.

To show how ridiculous this thing is, I received the other day a letter from my good friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] inclosing a number of telegrams from bakers of that State—remember, bakers. They were going to be ruined because wheat had declined 70 cents a bushel and flour 50 cents a barrel. In the first place, when wheat declines 1 cent flour ought to decline 5 cents. Every baker will tell you that. Flour should have declined $3.50 a barrel and not 50 cents. But these innocent New Jersey bakers, protesting against the Gronna bill because it reduced the price of flour—and yet they are bakers. It shows to what extent the propaganda is going on.

Then my good friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] sent me some letters from Alabama. It was going to ruin the producers of wheat in Alabama. You know better and the man who is familiar with agricultural conditions knows better, and he really must be amused over such reports as that. I certainly do not want to injure the farmers of Alabama any more than I do the farmers of my own State.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] did not happen to be in the Chamber a moment ago when I read a telegram from Indianapolis from the secretary of the State Farmers' Association condemning the action of Mr. Barnes, charging that they had to accept the minimum price as the maximum. Now they demand that this enormous advance, which is evidently indorsed by Mr. Barnes, shall not be made. If any Senators are farmers or if any of them are interested in farming conditions, they must admit that there are only two farmers in the United States who farm on a large scale who ever were successful in raising one crop, and those farmers are also engaged in other industries, so that whatever they lose on the farm they can afford to take out of the treasury of the other business concern. I do not desire to mention those farmers by name, though I could do so if I wished.

We know that it is a detriment to the farmer to make him believe that any product is going to be abnormally high in price, because he will then plant too much of that particular product, and nine times out of ten he will thereby go broke. The only way to make a profit on a farm or to make it even possible to live on a farm is to diversify crops, to rotate, to raise live stock, to keep cows and a few sheep, pigs, and chickens; to produce other things besides cereals, for the farmer will always have much grain which is not marketable but which is just as valuable for feed as though it were of the best quality.

I do not fear the anathemas of the farmers throughout the United States as to this proposition, because I know conditions and I am sure of my ground. If every dollar of this billion dollars and also the millions that have been earned as profits were used for propaganda against me, I should not hesitate to do exactly what I have done.

I have here a letter from a man up in New York State, from which I believe I will read an extract. He says:

> Your statement, as reported in the Senate and the Herald, to the effect that if the farmers would haul their grain to the mills and not charge a single penny for a bushel there would not be a difference of more than 2 cents a pound on a loaf of bread based upon the prices to the farmer is only too true.

I did not say based upon the prices in the terminal markets; I said the prices to the farmer; or if I did not say it, I certainly intended to say it.

> Mr. Hoover fixed the prices for grain so that the farmers suffer and at the same time Mr. Hoover made it possible for the hotel proprietors to charge the public 5 cents per ounce for rolls made out of the substitutes for flour.

And so forth. This man goes on to say that he believes the farmers throughout the country are not as much impressed with Mr. Hoover's candidacy for President as he might imagine.

I have another letter here, which is from Oklahoma, very severely criticizing the Grain Corporation. I shall not read this letter, but merely call attention to it.

I am also in receipt of a letter from a man in Indianapolis, Ind., a dealer, not a farmer. I shall not give his name, but the letter was sent to me by the distinguished Senator from Indiana. The writer bitterly complains against the treatment of the Grain Corporation and says that body ought to be abolished.

Mr. President, as I said at the outset, I have no other interest in the matter than what I believe to be for the public good. In the first place, I knew that a very limited amount—available amount, I will say—of wheat was left on the farms. I place the quantity at between fifty and sixty million bushels and not 228,000,000 bushels, as Mr. Barnes has stated, though in some letters he states the quantity as being 200,000,000 bushels. I also knew that very few of the farmers had received the high price for wheat; that most of them, as the secretary of the association in Indiana states, had to accept the guaranteed price.

When Mr. Barnes testified before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry he expressed the hope that we might do away with these Government agencies as soon as possible, in order to let business firms reknit, as he termed it. I understood, Mr. President, that he was willing to give up his position and the use of his tremendous power. I doubt if there is another agency in the United States so powerful as is this agency, having under its control nearly 30,000 licensees, whom they can make do pretty nearly as they please, unless they have some backbone; and we know that there are some of them, at least, who are afraid.

In the second place, I believe the policy is detrimental to consumers in general. Do you know that the farmers are consumers? Do you know that 40,000,000 people are living upon the farms and that they buy wheat flour and pay the same price as do others, although they have sold their wheat at a very low price? You ought to know that. The people on the farm pay exactly the same price that the people in the cities pay, unless they grind their own wheat in their own feed mills or something of that sort and produce whole wheat flour, which is not generally done, but which ought to be done. However, that may be done just as well by people living in the city if they desire to save money, for they may buy a coffee mill, grind the grain, and produce their own flour just as well as can the farmers, if they desire whole wheat flour.

Lastly, I took the action I did for the reason that I knew the conditions in the West; that the people of the States which I have mentioned, and especially of Montana and the two Dakotas—and it is true of the people in at least half of the area of the two States of North and South Dakota—must buy wheat for seed. It will require more wheat than we have in North Dakota in order to seed the entire State. So why should we wish wheat to go to such a price that it would be beyond the farmer's reach and he would thereby be discouraged from seeding wheat? Already we have discouraged the farmers so that the area of winter wheat has been reduced, as I have stated, from 50,000,000 acres to 38,000,000 acres. Reduce the spring wheat area to the same extent, and I will guarantee that the people of the cities will be mighty glad to buy wheat at a much higher price than the farmer has received for the last few years.

Mr. President, the facts and conditions I have stated are the only interests I have in this matter. I do not care a rap whether my bill passes or not. It has already done a great deal of good; it has brought to the attention of the people of the country that there was a possibility that a raid would be made by speculators upon this indispensable food product to make great profits and great fortunes.

Mr. President, at some future time I shall go into this question further. I have not discussed it as fully as I had intended, but there are other Senators who wish to address the Senate at this time, and I am sure the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is anxious to proceed with his retirement bill. The only men that I wish to retire just now are Mr. Hoover and Mr. Barnes. It is for their retirement I have been pleading and for their retirement I shall plead.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to discuss the bill of the Senator from North Dakota at this time. I am compelled to go to a conference on the railroad bill and only have a few moments.

I do not disagree with the Senator with regard to the original price-fixing bill. When the food-control act was passed by Congress after the beginning of the war, I was opposed to it in so far as it fixed or authorized the President to fix the price of wheat. I knew then that the market price of wheat was much higher than that named in the bill as a minimum, and that in all probability the price would be higher than any the President might fix, and it was higher in other countries than it was here. I believed at that time that the natural operation of the economic law of supply and demand was sufficient to encourage the production of wheat necessary in the great exigency of war. I do not believe in Government bureaus controlling the ordinary business of the country. I think it would have been wiser, so far as the producers were concerned, if the Congress had never passed a law fixing the price of wheat or if the President had not fixed it pursuant to the law. Wheat undoubtedly would have commanded a better price, at least, most of the time, than that fixed by law.

Mr. Barnes, however, did not advocate the law, nor is he in any way responsible for its passage. Neither did he create the Grain Corporation nor initiate Government control of the grain and food supply of the country, and I can not sit here and hear charges preferred against a citizen of my State without making a few remarks.

I have known Mr. Barnes since he was a boy. He is an able, honest, conscientious business man of great experience, who disposed of his business entirely and has devoted his services completely to this Government for the past two and a half or three years without any compensation whatsoever. He may have made mistakes; if he has, he has made them honestly.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that when the President fixed the price of wheat he was urged by some of us to establish a higher price, but he fixed it at $2.20 or $2.21—the Senator from North Dakota will correct me if I am wrong as to that.

Mr. GRONNA. The price fixed was $2.21.

Mr. KELLOGG. He afterwards raised it, on account of the increase of freight rates, to $2.26. For 1918 he fixed the same price. The country produced a vastly greater amount of grain; and in the fall of 1918, on September 2, the President published a proclamation guaranteeing the price for 1919 at $2.26, allowing different prices in various markets.

An enormous amount of winter wheat was planted in the fall of 1918. Hostilities ceased in November and there was tremendous agitation for Congress to take steps to carry out that guaranty. Letters and petitions were received from farmers and farmers' organizations and business men in wheat-producing sections and elsewhere demanding that the Congress pass a law appropriating money to carry out the guaranty made by the President on September 2, 1918.

The Senator from North Dakota and I both supported that bill, and I remember in the course of my remarks I yielded to the Senator from North Dakota, who said:

> Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Minnesota is correct in his statement. Congress appropriated only $150,000,000, to be used as a revolving fund, and whatever money was used above that was borrowed by the Grain Corporation. I do not know why any Senator should assume that we are appropriating a billion dollars here to be paid to anybody. It is an authorization, and the President would be allowed to draw upon this fund to the amount of a billion dollars. If it is not required, of course it will not be used; but Mr. Barnes—and I am glad to say to the Senator from Minnesota that I indorse what he has stated with reference to Mr. Barnes—has handled this matter efficiently and well. I have followed it with some interest, I will say to the Senator. Mr. Barnes has testified that we ought to have a billion dollars; that, in his judgment, we should not have any less. It was at first proposed that we should have a billion and a quarter dollars, but that was cut down to a billion dollars; not with any idea or view that this was going to be a loss to the Government—but I shall explain that later on, as I do not wish to take the Senator's time.

That was exactly the situation. We did not know how much money might be required. We did know that if there should be a production of a billion and a quarter bushels the likelihood was that the money would all be expended. As it turned out, there was a production of about 918,000,000 bushels instead of a billion and a quarter, as we expected; and the result has been that the Grain Corporation has not had to draw a dollar from the Treasury, and I hope it will not have to do so.

That bill was signed on the 4th of March, 1919, and I am sure that every Member of the Senate realized that they were passing it pursuant to the pledge given by the President to the farmers and to the country at large, guaranteeing a certain minimum price for wheat. I do not deny that wheat has been selling higher in the market most of the autumn and all of the winter—much higher than the Government price, that being only a minimum. The result has been that the Grain Corporation has its original capital now intact, and it has made, I think—I have never examined into the details—in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 in the past two and a half or three years from selling products to neutral countries, exclusive of the expense of the operation of the corporation, and I think it has been handled very well.

As to that corporation being created under State law and Mr. Barnes acting under a State corporation over which the Government has no control, I know the Senator does not intend to make any such statement that is not well founded. The original act authorized the President to utilize or create any agency he saw fit to carry out the guaranty, and the act of 1919 specifically authorized the President to use the Food Administration Grain Corporation; so that there is ample authority from the Congress. That was the only practical way to handle it. There existed no Federal law under which a corporation could be created, but there were plenty of laws in the States. Mr. Barnes did not organize or create the corporation. The President, I have no doubt, through the Attorney General, caused the corporation to be organized under the laws of some State—perhaps it is Delaware; I do not remember—and the United States owns all the capital stock and furnished all the capital and has absolute control over it, and Congress can liquidate it and stop its functions at any time it sees fit.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I admit that the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction and can stop it; but, of course, the only way in which it could stop it would be by legislation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Or order of the President.

Mr. GRONNA. And, if the Senator will permit me, I agree with him that the agency was set up as he has so well described it; but there is a condition existing just now. It would be possible for the Department of Agriculture, through the Bureau of Markets, to handle this matter from now on with very little difficulty, because the grain has now flowed to the terminals, and it would have to deal with only a very few people. It was different when the wheat was in the hands of the farmers, scattered throughout the country. Now the situation is different, and we could handle it in that way.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think it can be effectively handled through the Bureau of Markets. The farmers still have a large amount of wheat on their hands, and the Grain Corporation has entered into thousands of contracts which must be performed.

In 1918 the Grain Corporation only had $150,000,000 capital. On that capital, and the money it borrowed—because Congress did not appropriate the money—it handled the entire grain crop. The Grain Corporation was compelled to borrow of the banks of this country from three to five hundred million dollars, because the Congress had not appropriated money, which was paid back. Now, no individual could have accomplished that. The people who had to deal in grain, from whom it had to be bought, and the Governments to whom it had to be sold, would not accept the contract of an individual. They would take the contract of the United States Government; but the Senator knows the difficulty of handling a transaction of that kind through the Treasury of the United States. It can not be done. As to whether it could be handled henceforth by some other agency, I do not pretend to say one way or the other. The guaranty expires, anyhow, on the 1st of June.

I shall not discuss the Senator's bill, since I am quite sure the Senator does not intend to repeal the guaranty made by the Government. That guaranty, made in good faith, of course, should not be abolished by Congress. I am quite sure the Senator did not intend it. I think, however, his bill will require some amendment, because if you take away the appropriation, the capital, and the machinery for handling that guaranty, it could not be fulfilled without every farmer or every individual who has a claim against the Government presenting it. I think the Senator quite agrees with me in this respect.

I do not know how much wheat there is in the United States, but assume that there is anywhere from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels. I think the Senator will agree with me that that is a fair estimate—that at least there is 150,000,000 bushels, and probably considerably more. It is and has been selling much higher, and it is higher in foreign countries than the Government guaranteed price. The question now is not whether there is a scarcity of wheat. There is, of course, in the whole world. The Senator is right about that. The question at present is whether foreign Governments can buy it. That will be the serious question between now and next July. I do not know whether they can or not. Take France, for instance. I believe that the rate of exchange is about 3 to 1 now, so that if a bushel of wheat cost the French Government $3 in this country, it would cost, landed in France, about $10, including freight; and I doubt if the French Government can buy the grain under any such conditions.

I hope my fears will not be realized. I hope and believe that it can be sold to foreign countries, but I am not entirely sure of it. I want the farmer of my State and of every State to get all he can for his wheat, according to the markets of the world, and I want the assurance that if, for any reason which I can not now foresee, the price should fall below the Government guaranty, he will be protected. The pledge of this Government has been given, and it must be fulfilled.

So far as Mr. Barnes is concerned, I know he was originally opposed to a Government price-fixing policy. He was in favor of restoring operation of the natural laws of trade as soon as possible. The Senator says he has carried on a propaganda. I do not know to what extent anything of that kind has been done, but I notice that one of the circulars which the Senator called propaganda, which I hold in my hand, and which he introduced in the RECORD, is simply a statement of statistics covering receipts of the Grain Corporation and the flour and wheat statistics of the United States, which I think it was the duty of the corporation to publish.

I noticed the advertisement referred to by the Senator. It was an advertisement for the sale of flour. Now, the Grain Corporation did buy a large quantity of flour, as it was authorized to do under the law, and it had the flour for sale; and not knowing anything about it I assume, of course, that Mr. Barnes thought it was wise to call the attention of the retailers and consumers of flour in the country to the fact that the Government had this flour for sale. I am very sure that Mr. Barnes would not advertise simply for the purpose of spending the Government's money, and I have never seen any evidence that Mr. Barnes has used the Grain Corporation—and I do not know that the Senator intended that to be an inference—to promulgate propaganda to promote Mr. Hoover's candidacy for President, nor do I believe he is the manager of Mr. Hoover's political affairs. I do not know whether Mr. Hoover is a candidate or intends to be. I do know that Mr. Barnes would not use a Government agency for an illegitimate purpose. He may have made a mistake in advertising flour, or in publishing statements; but, if he did, I have every reason to believe that he did it in good faith.

I can not discuss the embargo. That was declared, of course, by the President, and I am sure the Senator believes that Mr. Barnes originally had nothing whatever to do with it. It was put on because of war conditions. The President believed that we should control the exportation of food to foreign countries, so as to see that our allies were properly protected and that none of that food found its way to Germany. I shall not stop to discuss it. I understood this year that Mr. Barnes was in favor of lifting the embargo after the war was over, but that the President determined to continue it for a time. I do not even know now when it was raised. I think it was the 15th of December. The Senator thinks it was the 15th of November.

Mr. President, I believe that in our price-fixing campaign of the last three years we have learned a lesson, and that we will not try it again. I believe that we will allow the natural laws of supply and demand and the normal energy and enterprise of the American people to take care of our commerce, because if we are going to depend upon Government regulation, control, and management of the great industries of this country we shall suffer materially. But the mistake has been made, and we should rectify it, fulfilling the pledge to the people of the country as well and with as little cost as we can, and let trade return, as far as it is possible, to its natural channel. I fully believe that the farmer would have received more money for his wheat if we had not passed the original bill. I believe the natural laws of supply and demand would have increased price and production.

Mr. President, I have made these remarks because it is my conviction that Mr. Barnes is a gentleman of the highest integrity and character, and for the further reason that I think it is improper upon the floor of the Senate to discredit in the absence of substantial evidence any man who serves the Government to the best of his ability who does not have an opportunity to defend himself.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of Post No. 58, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Jewell City; of James R. Fulton Post, No. 257, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Garden City; and of William H. Lytle Post, No. 32, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Fort Scott, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Miltonvale, Kans., and a memorial of sundry citizens of McPherson County, Kans., remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHIPPS presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Colorado Milling & Elevator Co., of Denver; the Denver Grain Exchange Association; the Lamar Flour Mills; the Model Flour Mills, of Greeley; and the Crescent Flour Mills, of Denver, all in the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Gronna wheat guaranty bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Genessee Valley Society of Optometrists, of Flint, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the excise tax on spectacles and eyeglasses, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 82, International Association of Machinists, of Detroit, Mich., and a petition of Local Lodge No. 8, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for a two years' extension of Government control of railroads, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have received since yesterday a large number of petitions from citizens in the State of Massachusetts praying Congress to investigate the proposed sale of the German fleet and requesting that final action be delayed until all the facts are ascertained and given full publicity. The wording of the petitions is identical, and I ask that the body of one of them may be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the body of one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

We appeal to the Members of Congress to use their influence with President Wilson to halt the proposed sale on Monday of 30 former German ships.

Further, we petition that there be a most thorough and full investigation of every important fact covering the proposed sale. This investigation should most thoroughly probe the report that the Shipping Board plans to sell these ships, including some of the largest and finest steamships afloat, for $28,000,000, which is declared to be but one-third of their real value.

We desire to ask why can not the Government itself operate these fine ships rather than sacrifice two-thirds of their value?

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a petition from the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion of the United States of America.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRIVATE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' LEGION
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1920.

To the honorable the Vice President and the Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We respectfully present the following petition:

Resolved by the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion, That we hereby petition the President and Congress of the United States to take all necessary steps at once to prevent the proposed sale by the United States Shipping Board to a private corporation of the fleet of former German ships or any other ships owned by the United States Government.

Resolved, That we respectfully request the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled to appoint select committees to investigate this proposed sale of Government ships with a view to disclosing whether there is in connection therewith any violation of law or sacrifice of the public's interests; and if so, to prevent or punish the same.

Respectfully submitted.

PRIVATE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' LEGION,
MARVIN GATES SPERRY, National President.

IMPORTATION OF COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. WATSON. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," and I submit a report (No. 425) thereon. I wish to give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall call up the bill for action by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (by request):

A bill (S. 3910) to investigate the claims of and to enroll certain persons, if entitled, with the Omaha Tribe of Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3911) to repeal section 7 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917 (40 Stat., 383); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3912) granting a pension to William A. Walsh; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000,000 for the preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 for the prevention of losses in the marketing of fruits and vegetables through deterioration, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I venture merely to say that on Monday next, on the conclusion of any remarks the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] may desire to make upon the treaty when he calls it up before the Senate, I shall address the Senate upon the reconsideration of the treaty in the light of its revision in Paris and the rediscovery of the Constitution of the United States in the Capital City of Washington.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have been requested by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to ask that he be relieved from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. I send to the desk the following order and ask for its adoption.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. DIAL be relieved from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia and appointed a member of the Committee on Commerce.

Ordered, That Mr. GLASS be appointed a member of the following committees: Appropriations, District of Columbia, Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, Expenditures in the Interior Department, and Fisheries.

LINCOLN'S GETTYSBURG ADDRESS.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, I present so much of pages 2791, 2792 and 2793 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, February 12, 1920, as relates to President Lincoln's Gettysburg address. I ask that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view of having it printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

EGYPT AND THE CUBAN MODEL.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article on Egypt and the Cuban model taken from the publication called The Nation of Saturday, January 10, 1920.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EGYPT AND THE CUBAN MODEL.

Of the three imperial problems—Ireland, India, and Egypt—which have grown acute since the coming of peace, the last is, to our thinking, by far the simplest. Given straight vision and a little moral courage, it could be settled with a minimum of risks and regrets. There is no Ulster complication. There is none of the ancient accumulation of wrongs, hatreds, vested interests, and inbred sentiments, which have grown round Ireland and India. Our connection with Egypt, as time goes in the life of nations, is of yesterday, and our possession, which dates in any regular form only from 1914, is not graven on the heart of the British race. Moreover, there is here none of that desperate mixture of races and religions which at once facilitates foreign rule in India and makes it difficult to end it. The Coptic minority is too small to make a problem, and it is now in full agreement with the solid nationalist movement. The reasons which make for the protectorate are all of them external—strategy, prestige, and the interests of European finance.

The events of the past year have abundantly shown that we can not continue to hold Egypt on the terms contemplated when the protectorate was imposed, without grave scandal and serious danger. We have a united nation against us, and even if its military power is negligible, it is obvious that if the recent record of strikes, riots, and attempted assassinations were to continue, our reputation as clement and efficient administrators would be at an end. Throughout the world our tenure of Egypt would come to be recognized as one of the classical iniquities of imperialism, like Russian rule in Poland. The present coalition may be able to rule by sheer force; it has little moral credit to lose. A labor government, which we almost certainly will have in the near future, would have to make a change. Its foreign minister could not defend what Lord Curzon will defend, and its supporters in the country would not tolerate what even the coalition press dislikes. If the Milner mission fails to arrive at a settlement, the crisis is only postponed, to recur infallibly when labor comes to power. The composition of the Milner mission does not impress us favorably, but since its arrival there is none the less some progress to report. Finding itself boycotted, the mission took the initiative in issuing an invitation to the Egyptian people to discuss the future of their country, and in doing so it dropped all mention of the hated protectorate. How far that was only an exercise of verbal tact we do not know. Moderate Egyptians took it to mean much more, and there have in consequence been some informal meetings, and one notes a readiness to discuss or suggest modes of settlement. The letter from Saad Pasha Zagloul, which we print this week, contains some welcome proof of moderation. He does not spare our feelings, though his choice of several needlessly violent expressions may be due to a foreigner's unfamiliarity with our language. While he maintains the unbending demand for independence, the latter part of his letter goes very far, further indeed than we would have expected, to meet the reasonable demands of the Empire in concrete matters.

We will say at once that we hold, as a matter both of honor and expediency, that the demand for independence must be conceded. It was, indeed, as he points out, conceded, or, rather, anticipated, in the King's letter of 1914 to the Khedive. Behind that letter there still stand on record the promises, as binding, formal, and definite as words can be, given by Mr. Gladstone and others, to evacuate Egypt. The old world of cynical and secret statecraft took such promises very lightly. When we chose, however, to rest our main case against Germany on the breach of just such a promise as this, made three generations ago to Belgium, we took our stand deliberately on a new conception of good faith between the strong and the weak. The case for a League of Nations has actually been based by our most authoritative statesmen on the need for an international organization which will secure the observance of covenants. Here, then, are two contracts which we can not evade, the old promise to evacuate and the recent guaranty of independence. It is not at all difficult to revise the conception of a protectorate in the light of the new international order. The League of Nations was not a fact—it was barely an aspiration—in 1914. Since that date a whole new international machinery has come into existence, which will guarantee small States in their independence and protect them. We were not thinking of all this in 1914. It would involve no inconsistency and no loss of prestige if we were now to revise our earlier notion of a protectorate, in the light of the new institutions. Two principles we would lay down for the future procedure. In the first place, Egypt is an international problem. We can not act as we act in India. It is not for us to declare by the mere fiat of Downing Street, or oven of Parliament, that we shall grant this and reserve that. The league must be invoked to revise, to control, and to register what is done. In the second place, whatever arrangement is reached must be by agreement between the British Empire on the one hand and Egypt on the other. One does not issue decrees to an "independent" State. One concludes a treaty with it. If we are to "protect" it, under the supervision of the league, it must be on a treaty basis which Egypt herself accepts. These are the minimum requirements of good faith. If they are ignored to-day, we must be prepared for a repudiation and revision of our present action by labor. Labor all the world over is destined to bring its simple interpretations of words and promises into the old murky atmosphere of statecraft. Its dictionaries contain no esoteric gloss on the word "independence," and by a promise to "evacuate" it understands marching out.

Saad Pasha dislikes our tentative suggestion that the council of the league, after hearing the views of Egypt, might confer a "mandate" on the British Empire to "protect" Egypt. The mandate system, as it has been actually worked, is smeared with hypocrisy, and we can understand his dissent. There is a model from the New World which might be worth studying. When the United States helped the Cubans to throw off the Spanish yoke it followed a decidedly novel procedure. It helped the Cubans to draft a constitution, which followed the American model closely. It then induced the Cuban Assembly to accept a series of conditions known as the Platt amendments, which were embodied in the Cuban constitution and also in a permanent treaty between Cuba and the United States. Cuba became an independent Republic with the status of a sovereign State (she is to-day an original member of the league). She has her own army and conducts her own foreign relations. She accepted, however, certain conditions. She may not conclude any arrangement with a foreign power detrimental to her own independence. She may not alienate the financial resources of the island above a certain limit. She undertook certain obligations to continue the good sanitary work which the United States began. She agreed to sell or lease naval and coaling stations to the United States. Finally, she accorded to the United States the right of intervention to preserve Cuban independence and to maintain "a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba" contained in the treaty of Paris. When this treaty was concluded the American troops and officials evacuated the island. The right of reentry has once been used, and the occupation was renewed from 1906 to 1909, when once more the troops were withdrawn and the original constitution came again into full force.

That model might very well be followed in the case of Egypt with some modifications. There must be some financial safeguards and some arrangement in Egypt's interest to secure her the full use of the waters of the Nile for irrigation. Where America asked for coaling stations, we might stipulate for some footing at Suez to safeguard the canal. The capitulations and the mixed courts would have to be considered and safeguarded, subject to some large reforms. We should not expect Egyptians to welcome any clause which gave us the right to renew the occupation, if there should be a lapse into anarchy or civil war, nor do we think that it should lie solely with the British Empire to determine when the need for such an intervention had arisen. There was no League of Nations when the Cuban treaty was drawn. We would suggest that this right of reentry should be exercised only on an express mandate from the league. It should lie with the league to determine through its council, after hearing the Egyptian as well as the British Government, when, if ever, there existed a degree of danger, external or internal, which called for our intervention as protectors. The council of the league would equally have the right to decide, when in such a case the danger had come to an end, and when the temporary occupation should cease. That provision ought, we think, to meet any reasonable fears in this country, nor would it destroy Egyptian independence if the league can be made an honest reality. It should, as Saad Pasha most fairly stipulates, lie with the Egyptians themselves to decide how far they will employ British civil servants. An arrangement of this kind would insure us against the bare possibility of internal anarchy. These are the legitimate aims of a "protectorate." The word is fatal because it is commonly a veil for annexation. The thing, so far as our aims are honestly limited to the real function of "protecting," can be attained without any real surrender of Egyptian independence.

For our part, we have little doubt that Egypt could govern herself without disaster. Her problems are relatively very simple. She is solvent. She has a homogeneous and normally law-abiding population. She has no external enemies. She has, above all, no such social divisions as are rending so many European States. Compare her case with that of Poland, or any of the new eastern or central States, and we think that any insurance society would back her survival, while it would stake very little on theirs. There are fifty reasons for "protecting" Poland, where there is one for protecting Egypt. These anomalies can not continue indefinitely, nor will they continue after labor is in power. The wise course is to end them now.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator desire to proceed with a speech?

Mr. STERLING. I desire to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to make some remarks that may not be pertinent to the bill, but they, at least, ought to be of interest to the country.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

DEMOTION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on the 5th day of this month the Senate adopted a resolution that I had offered directing the Secretary of War to furnish to the Senate a statement giving specifically, among other things, the policy of the General Staff of the War Department with respect to the demotion of officers of the Regular Army.

The mass of information therein directed to be furnished is such that it will no doubt be several days before it can be prepared and presented to this body. It is touching the purposes of that resolution and the conditions prevailing in the Army caused by the policy of the General Staff of the War Department that I desire to-day to address myself.

And while what I may say is not intended as an expression upon my part of condemnation of the General Staff, it is in the hope that the facts which I shall reveal, as reflected in the Army from the policy of demotion adopted by the General Staff, will have some bearing in pointing out to the Secretary of War what perhaps he now no doubt knows, but which I trust did not appear to him when he indorsed that policy, the discriminations and favoritism that are revealed by the true facts, and will influence him to direct a change in the policy of demotions so far as can now be done to remedy the discriminations that have already been inflicted upon hundreds of Army officers.

There is little reason to lay plans for increasing the size of the Army and increased expenditures of millions on the Army with such a state of demoralization as now exists among the officers of the Army. There is little reason to lay plans for a universal military training system that the people of the country may be further burdened by heavy taxes and the young men taken from their peaceful studies, trades, and professions, compelling them to accept that training, if the officers are so demoralized that their spirit is blasted and their morale shattered. The officers of the Regular Army are a part of the fighting forces of the country, and the efficiency and spirit of those fighting forces depend in a large measure upon the contentment and spirit of the officers. The best that is within a man, in civil as well as military life, can not possibly exert itself with his peace of mind shattered and spirit broken.

The continual climb in prices and abnormal war conditions have added new responsibilities and increased burdens in the homes represented by every private and officer in the fighting forces of America. I sometimes think that some of these men who fought the Boche abroad and brought success to our arms feel that it was perhaps an easier job than to combat the conscienceless profiteer at home.

Sirs, those of us who did not come in contact with the Army life during the war little appreciate the hardships visited upon the families of the men who fought the war.

I had a letter not so long ago from a little woman, the wife of a Regular Army officer, and the condition depicted by her in her letter—conditions which practically every wife of every man in the fighting forces of America had to endure while their husbands were abroad during the war—would touch the heart of the most indifferent and unsympathetic. She said, in part:

> I do not speak for ourselves particularly. I can truthfully say that I am voicing the opinion and feeling of every woman in all branches of the service, for we are all confronted with the same serious and discouraging problems that are trying to make prewar pay meet the present higher cost of living. It is we women who come in contact with the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, and we are so appalled by the impossibility of making both ends meet. Looking back to 1912, when my husband was a captain, it seems so different now. Then we had our little home and the cost of living was such that we were able not only to live reasonably well but save a little. During the war my husband was promoted to a lieutenant colonel, and the pay increased, but nothing like in proportion to the cost of living. Our children have grown up now and need education, and so many more responsibilities are upon us than were back in 1912. I am now broken-hearted and my husband is demoralized. His spirit seems to be gone, because under the demotion plan he is reduced to a captain and we can not make ends meet at all. I do not know what we are to do. He chose the Army when he entered West Point, and has given his life to its service. He has now reached the age where he can not get anything else to do and knows nothing that he could do. It is a terrible condition that confronts the wives of the men in the Army, and I hope that the Congress can do something to remedy the situation.

Senators, can you imagine a more discouraging condition to a soldier or the wife of a soldier who faces such conditions as depicted in that letter? Officers reduced to the rank that they held in 1912 and compelled to exist on the pay then paid to officers of that rank—compelled to pay present-day prices on 1912 salaries. Is there an employer who can employ labor on 1912 wages? Does the wheat farmer of the West make his crop to-day on 1912 wages? Do the great mass of bread consumers of to-day pay 1912 prices for flour? Does the cotton planter of to-day make his crop by paying 1912 wages? And does the cotton manufacturer and, in turn, the cotton consumers pay to the cotton planter 1912 cotton prices? In what business and in what place in this country can one single instance be pointed to, except in the United States Army or Navy, where men are compelled to exist to-day under conditions that prevailed in 1912? You can not have contentment in the Army; you can not free it from demoralization; you can not have the proper fighting spirit and draw from men the very best that is within them for themselves, their families, or their country when their Government adopts a policy of reducing them to the same rank with the same pay that they received from their Government in 1912, and at the same time permit a condition to exist in this country that will compel them to pay three times as much for the clothing that they wear, for the food that they eat, and for the necessities that they enjoy. And even though you increase the pay to them to meet the new conditions, when their Government adopts a policy that closes the door of equal, fair treatment, of equal, fair opportunity in promotions, then, sirs, you countenance an evil that must be eliminated if morale and contentment are to continue.

By the passage of the Wadsworth bill this week we increased the pay of some of the men in the fighting forces of the country. That was a step in the right direction and will help in a measure. I was sorry that we did not go further and I was glad by my voice and my vote to try to enlarge the scope of that measure, but, sirs, that measure in itself will not bring the desired result.

It will not drive away the spirit of demoralization that now hovers over the Army. The plan of demotion adopted and enforced by the General Staff has caused such an unrest and such dissatisfaction within the ranks of the Regular Army that, in my opinion, it will take a decade to remove. I want to know the reasons for this unfair discrimination, this illogical method of demotion. I want to know the reasons that prompted the General Staff to inaugurate such a plan. I want to know who will assume the responsibility and who will have the courage and the sense of fairness to remedy the situation.

I am not going to charge favoritism on the part of the General Staff, neither am I going to charge incompetency, because I have too high a regard for some of the men who make up the staff to believe that they would countenance favoritism, and certainly the splendid record made by many of the men composing the General Staff during the war, adding to our country's glory, would disprove the suggestion of incompetency. I have a very high regard for the Secretary of War, and I believe that when the true history of this war is written and the splendid acts of his administration are revealed that his management of the War Department will compare in brilliancy, if not surpass, any of his distinguished predecessors. When I think of this policy of demotion I content myself in the belief that it was one of the few mistakes that was made by very efficient men in a great undertaking. I can not believe that when the policy was adopted that it was ever dreamed by either the General Staff or the Secretary of War that it would work in so many cases such unfair discrimination and unjust results, and it is because of those conclusions that I very sincerely believe that the General Staff and the Secretary of War will hasten to undo this great wrong and adopt another policy that will be nondiscriminatory, fair, and just to all alike.

Shakespeare spoke in parables when he said:

> Who steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing: * * *
> But he that filches from me my good name, robs me of that which not enriches him, and makes me poor indeed.

In the cases of demotion of a great number of officers the General Staff has not only succeeded in taking from their purse, but has filched from their good names.

At the World's Fair there was what was called the "incubator babies," and many of you will recall the barker's famous patter: "Ladies and gents, this is Willie; he gained a tenth of an ounce last week; don't laugh, ladies and gents; it may not mean much to you, but it means a lot to Willie." And so it is a pathetic thing that Army officers of long and distinguished services and large families have been demoted to junior ranks with smaller pay, while younger officers, years their junior, are still in the higher grades and drawing higher pay. It may not mean much to the General Staff, but it means a lot to "Willie."

Demobilization must of necessity bring demotion of officers, but not of necessity demoralization to officers. Why, then, do we find demoralization? The answer is the belief prevalent among the officers that favoritism and incompetency was displayed by the General Staff in carrying out this policy of demotion.

Promotions of Regular Army officers during the World War were, as a rule, made to last during the "present emergency." In September, 1919, it looked as though the treaty of peace would be soon signed by the United States and that the "emergency" would terminate. The Congress saw that should this state of affairs come to pass Regular Army officers would lose their advanced rank and all reserve officers commissioned for the "emergency" would necessarily be discharged. To meet this situation Congress in September, 1919, passed the law that authorized the War Department to retain until June 30, 1920, an officer strength of 18,000, about equally distributed between Regulars and Reserves. The act provided that the—> Secretary of War is authorized * * * to retain at their temporary grades such officers of the Regular Army as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper functions of the Military Establishment.

The War Department distributed the 18,000 officers by grades as follows: One hundred generals, 693 colonels, 797 lieutenant colonels, and so forth. As there were at the time many more officers in the various grades than the numbers authorized it became necessary to demote many officers.

What system followed? Let us call in the General Staff, that organization that is on duty in the War Department, known in Prussia as the great general staff, and which was abolished in Germany on demand of the representatives of the Allies by the treaty of peace, but which, may I be pardoned for calling to the attention of the Senate, is proposed by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate to be perpetuated in the United States in the Wadsworth bill as the War Department General Staff.

It would seem to me, and I am sure it would appear the same to the average person, that the General Staff in its plan of demotion should have given some consideration in adopting its policy, first, that officers who had performed the most brilliant service in the war should have been retained in the advanced grades in order of merit; second, or that officers should have retained their rank according to length of service, that is, by seniority. Neither of these propositions evidently was considered by the General Staff. They proposed, as stated by the Secretary of War in substance, that "officers should be demoted when their emergency jobs should end."

You will recall, Senators, that as the Army was being returned from France and demobilized that its officers immediately upon their return were reduced in rank, while the Washington clique retained their advanced rank. Why, sirs, I am told that shave-tail colonels at Hoboken would greet the returned veterans, brigadier generals and colonels, and order them to take off their stars and eagles and adjourn to a reduced rank. I am told that it was understood in the Army that generals, colonels, and lieutenant colonels before landing at home from abroad were notified to carry in their knapsacks the insignias of captains, majors, and lieutenant colonels. It was unfortunate that the Secretary of War apparently approved the policy of the General Staff when its policy of demotion had been subjected to adverse criticism from other sources, when he gave out an interview stating, in effect, that officers had been retained in advanced rank not on account of relative merit or seniority, but simply to complete their war jobs, at the end of which they would be demoted.

I have no doubt that the General Staff deceived the Secretary in having him believe that certain officers retained in their advanced rank were really performing "emergency jobs." The strongest reason for the charge of favoritism on the part of the General Staff comes out of these so-called "emergency jobs." It would seem to some people that in many instances the thought that was uppermost in the minds of the General Staff in retaining certain men at advanced rank was to put up "a job on Congress and the Secretary of War." Certainly if that was their desire they did not fall short of its accomplishment.

Victor Hugo, in his oration on Voltaire, describes the great humanitarian's "splendid warfare" against "L'Infame." In order to lay bare the infamous system against which Voltaire fought, he uses these words: "I will confine myself to the citation of two facts, but decisive ones." Then follows a narrative of the martyrdom of Jean Calas and the Chevalier de la Barre.

The senior Senator from Oregon, Senator CHAMBERLAIN, has recently on the floor of the Senate cited the demotion of Gen. Kutz, and in the course of his remarks stated that "there are thousands like it." I accept his statement.

There is, in my opinion, more to the Kutz case than the Senator revealed, so you will pardon me for elaborating on that a bit and then imitate Hugo by citing not two additional cases but several, and all "decisive ones."

The first case let us call Kutz and others against Loving. And, sirs, let me state in this connection that, personally, I do not know a single Army officer named among the names that I shall call. Not only have I not talked with any of them or had any communication from them, but I have never met them personally. I make this statement that no prejudice against any of them may arise in the minds of any member of the General Staff or that they be prejudiced by any use that I may make of their names in this discussion. I have gathered the information that I shall give to the Senate from the RECORD and other sources, but I lay them down as facts and challenge the General Staff or any person to controvert them.

According to the United States Army Register, Charles W. Kutz was born October 14, 1870, and was graduated at West Point June 12, 1893. James J. Loving was born February 20,

1884, and was graduated at West Point June 12, 1906. Kutz is 14 years older and has served in the Army 13 years longer to the day than Loving. On April 6, 1917, Kutz was engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, with the rank of lieutenant colonel in the Corps of Engineers of the Army. Loving was assistant engineer commissioner of the District, with the rank of captain in the Corps of Engineers. After war had been declared Kutz was promoted to the rank of colonel, and in the late summer of 1917 was ordered to France, where he performed most brilliant service, for which he was promoted to the grade of brigadier general and later awarded the distinguished service medal. Gen. J. G. D. Knight, retired, was called into active service to replace Kutz as engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, while Loving was retained as assistant commissioner, and as such performed his entire war service in Washington, D. C. Note well the locality—in Washington, D. C. Now, I do not say that in criticism of Mr. Loving. There is no doubt he is a splendid soldier and an efficient officer, and if it had been in his power he would have gone overseas and served abroad. His services in Washington were under the direction of the War Department and I do not emphasize the locality of his labors to detract from him as an officer. I am only using it as I could so many others to draw a comparison to illustrate my point of discrimination and unfairness. The position that Loving was filling in Washington was an "emergency job" because Loving was promoted in that work to the grade of a colonel. Now, on December 16, 1918, Kutz was ordered back on his old job as engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia and was promptly demoted to the grade of lieutenant colonel. His once subordinate, Loving, was still on the job as assistant commissioner with the rank of colonel. Loving remained as such for about three months, and so during that period we have the assistant engineer commissionership of the District of Columbia designated by the General Staff as an "emergency job," while the engineer commissionership was not an "emergency job."

But the General Staff finally became very considerate in this matter. I do not know whether it was because of Loving or because of Kutz or because of the growing feeling in the Army, but, at any rate, in order to relieve the embarrassment, Loving was ordered by the General Staff in March, 1919, to Baltimore to work on harbor defenses and improvements. That was another "emergency job," for Loving continued to retain the rank of colonel. In October, 1919, when it became known to the favored few in the Army that the act of September, 1918, was to be enforced, we find Loving shifted by the General Staff to the command of the First Engineers, another "emergency job," which he retains until this day with the rank of a colonel.

Is it possible that the General Staff can believe that the action accorded to Kutz and many other distinguished officers situated as he was is calculated to add to the morale and spirit of the Army? Can anyone connected with the War Department defend that very unjust discrimination, that apparent unfair piece of favoritism?

Now, let us consider case No. 2, which I will call Hodges et al. against Sturtevant. John N. Hodges was born February 13, 1884, and was graduated from West Point June 13, 1905. Clarence L. Sturtevant was born August 1, 1884, and was graduated at West Point February 14, 1908. So these two gentlemen are of about the same age, although the former graduated about three years ahead of the latter. At the outbreak of the war Hodges stood 14 and Sturtevant 35 on the list of captains of the Corps of Engineers of the Army. Hodges went to France with the Sixth Engineers in December, 1917, and in the great German drive of 1918 commanded those companies of the Sixth which formed a part of "Carey's Chickens." These few Americans helped stop the gap between the British and French armies. Hodges was awarded the British distinguished service order for gallantry. He later commanded the Sixth Engineers in many battles of the summer of 1918 and was promoted to brigadier general for gallantry and efficient service in the field. On November 11, 1919, Hodges was in command of a brigade at Camp Devens, Mass.

Sturtevant was restrained from going across and serving his country abroad. He never saw France during the war, and when the war ended his "emergency job" was that of "student," with the rank of colonel, in the War College in Washington. He was shifted to duty with Engineer troops at Camp Fremont, Colo.; then to the coast defense and harbor works at Seattle, Wash. Hodges, on his return from overseas, was demoted by the General Staff to the grade of major. Sturtevant was given an "emergency job" commanding Hodges's old regiment, the "Sixth Engineers." Hodges commanded the regiment gloriously in France and is now a major. Sturtevant, his junior, who never saw France, now gloriously commands it at Camp Pike, and is still colonel. Were Hodges and the many other distinguished officers, seniors to Sturtevant, who have been demoted to the grades of major and lieutenant colonel given a chance at this "emergency job" of colonel of the Sixth Engineers? If not, may I ask why not?

No one can answer that question satisfactorily except the General Staff, and I doubt if they should answer it now that either its fairness or justice would appeal to them.

Let me suggest for your consideration the case of Jewett and others against Park. Henry C. Jewett was born April 8, 1879, and graduated at West Point February 18, 1901. Richard Park was born November 20, 1883, and graduated at West Point June 14, 1907. At the outbreak of the war Jewett stood thirty-fifth on the list of majors and Park twenty-eighth on the list of captains of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army. Jewett went to France as colonel of a regiment of divisional engineers; was chief of staff of a division; and, for gallantry in command of a brigade on the field of battle, was awarded the distinguished service cross. He was also awarded the croix de guerre and various other decorations by foreign Governments. Park served at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., near Washington, D. C. He was executive officer of the camp and was awarded the distinguished service medal. I have no doubt that he performed a great service, and what I may say touching Mr. Park is not to detract from his efficiency as an officer or character as a man. The services that he was rendering, the duties that he was performing, were at the instance and under the direction of the General Staff; but, sirs, let me analyze the treatment accorded to him and that accorded to Jewett.

On July 1, 1919, Jewett had returned to the United States and was instructor of an Engineer school at Camp Humphreys, while Park in the same camp was disbursing officer in charge of Engineer construction work and preparation of plans and estimates for the proposed Engineer school and post and college of military research, Camp Humphreys, Va. Jewett was ordered to river work at St. Paul, Minn., and the General Staff demoted him to the grade of major. Park was shifted by the General Staff to an "emergency job" as colonel of the Fifth Engineers, and retains to this day the rank of colonel. Now, if you ask me "who warned these various Richards to flee from the wrath to come," and to obtain these "emergency" positions while distinguished veterans of the war who heard the clash of steel, the sound of cannon, and the groans of dying on a hundred battle fields were placed in nonemergency jobs, I can not answer you. It is all embodied in the policy adopted by the General Staff, a policy that in the minds of the officers of the Army is tainted with suspicion and the blighting influence of which extends throughout the Army.

The country will never understand how Capt. Carl Truesdell, who relieved Lieut. Col. John Brockman as chief signal officer of the Fifth Army Corps, and who was awarded the distinguished service medal, croix de guerre with three palms, and legion of honor for his services overseas, and for those services was promoted to colonel on his return to the United States, was assigned to the Army service school at Fort Leavenworth and demoted to the grade of captain. And while this plan of demotion was being measured out to this gallant officer the same officer that he relieved at Argonne because of inefficiency and reasons best known to the corps commander is to-day on duty in the city of Washington and retaining his rank as lieutenant colonel.

I might cite the case of Lieut. Col. LeRoy S. Upton, who commanded at Chateau-Thierry and Soissons, and for gallant services was awarded the distinguished service cross, the distinguished service medal, and the croix de guerre. He was promoted to brigadier general and commanded magnificently a brigade in the Argonne. On his return to the United States he was demoted to a lieutenant colonel, while at least two officers whose names I have here, but which perhaps it is better not to designate, who were relieved from their commands at Argonne for incompetency, are to-day retaining their ranks as colonels in the United States Army.

I might cite the case of Lieut. Col. Briant H. Wells, who performed distinguished service at Metz and was promoted to the rank of brigadier general, serving as chief of staff in the Fourth Army Corps. Prior to that he was the principal assistant to Gen. Tasker H. Bliss in the conduct of the delicate negotiations attending the functions of the supreme war council at Versailles. Upon his return to the United States Brig. Gen. Wells was demoted to a lieutenant colonel, and he is now serving in the war plans division of the General Staff, War Department, under the immediate direction of a colonel who saw no service with combat troops in the late war and who is a junior to Col. Wells in the Regular Army by 366 files.

I might cite the case of Col. W. H. Johnston, who was promoted to the rank of major general and commanded the Ninety-first Division in action in France and Belgium. After distinguished and heroic service he was awarded the distinguished service medal, the distinguished service cross, the legion of honor, the croix de guerre, and the crown of Belgium. On his return to the United States the General Staff assigned him to the General Staff College and demoted him to the rank of colonel. To-day Gen. Johnston is outranked by 23 major generals and 42 brigadier generals, not one of whom commanded a division in action, and 2 of whom, if the same treatment had been accorded to them in demotion as was applied by the General Staff on Gen. Johnston, would to-day be captains.

In all the many cases that could be further cited I know of none that smacks of such injustice and gross discrimination as the case of Gen. Preston Brown. He served in France as chief of staff of the Second Division at Chateau-Thierry, Soissons, and St. Mihiel; chief of staff of the Fourth Army Corps in front of Metz, and by selection and special assignment commanded the Third Division in the Argonne. He was assistant chief of staff of all the American Expeditionary Forces, and was awarded the distinguished service medal for handling with great credit the details of the battle at Chateau-Thierry, Soissons, St. Mihiel, and for splendid judgment and skill in handling the Third Division in the battle at Argonne at a most critical time. He was bestowed with the legion of honor as well as the crown of Belgium for heroic services. On his return to the United States with a record for gallantry unexcelled and honors fairly won, deserving of the thanks of a grateful Nation, he was immediately demoted to the grade of major and assigned as an instructor in the General Staff College. On October 17, 1918, Gen. Pershing, in a cable, recommended Maj. Brown for promotion to major general. The General Staff, so far as known, took no action thereon.

It would not be inappropriate in this connection for me to cite to the Senate the fact that to-day Maj. Brown is ranked by 23 major generals, 42 brigadier generals, 1,200 colonels, and 1,224 lieutenant colonels who never commanded a division in action. And I would like to cite to the Senate the further fact that Maj. Brown is now a junior in the same college with Col. von dem Busche, who is a captain in the Regular Army 464 files the junior of Maj. Brown. Col. von dem Busche was never allowed by the General Staff to go to France and saw no service in action.

I am sure many of you Senators are familiar with the cases of Gens. W. C. Langfitt and Mason M. Patrick. The former was chief engineer of the American Expeditionary Forces, the latter the chief of the Air Service in France. Both performed splendid and distinguished services and on their return to the United States were demoted to the grade of colonel. To-day these men, who enjoyed the high rank abroad and who rendered the distinguished service there, are outranked by men of the Army who were majors at the outbreak of the war and their juniors by many files.

One might see how the command of the First, Fifth, and Sixth Engineers and many other organizations in the presence of the enemy at the front were "emergency" jobs, and how out of gratitude the Nation might have retained their commanders in an advanced grade after return to the United States, but that was not the policy adopted by the General Staff. They saw no "emergency" jobs for these distinguished officers, but immediately upon their return home these men were welcomed by seeing their ranks demoted and viewing at dress parade splendid junior officers who had served their country heroically around the battlements of Washington.

In view of these citations and hundreds of others that I could cite, is there any wonder why there should not be great fear among the officers of the proposed method of treatment by the General Staff in the new Army reorganization bill? Officers are to be "selected for the establishment of three lists—A, B, and C." List A will contain names fit for promotion. List B those not fit for promotion at present. List C the names of the goats "cursed from the foundation of the world." May we ask the General Staff whether the same system will prevail in promotion as prevailed in demotion? If the demotion policy of the General Staff worked so unfairly, on what can the Army officer hope of the General Staff in making promotions?

Do you suppose there could be found outside the General Staff of the Army a single employer who would penalize the employee who left them to serve their country in this great World War by promoting those who remained here and demoting, upon their return, those who went away? And if no cases can be cited in ordinary civil employment, how much stronger does the responsibility rest upon the Government to see that none of those who went to the front at duty's call be penalized for performing that service abroad in being demoted, while those who remained at home, enjoying their own hearthstones and the happiness of peace and comfort here, be promoted.

It is an inspiring reflection that so many of the large corporations in this country, against whom much prejudice has been arrayed, should have given during this war to those employees who enlisted in the Army or Navy their regular and full pay, holding open all the time their positions against all seekers.

Sirs, I would like to see the American Legion blacklist every employer and criticize every department head who did not measure out to the brave and patriotic men and women who sacrificed and served their country abroad in this great crisis fair and just treatment. Cold-hearted, indeed, is the employer who, at the outbreak of the war, saw the young lad drafted and sent to the front, and, after his services to his country, returned to the position and found the door locked against him.

A grateful Nation should see that every man in the fighting forces of this country in the late war be treated fairly, and no blacker page has been written, no greater degree of injustice perpetrated, no more inequitable wrong inflicted upon any part of the fighting forces than has been meted out by the General Staff in its policy of demotion.

What I have said, Mr. President, will be taken by some as an unjust criticism. I am not given to criticism. I much prefer to overlook the little mistakes and see the beauty of great achievement. In this war mistakes were inevitable. No enterprise of such magnitude could have been conducted without mistakes being made. It was to be expected, but I am quite sure that the men at the head of the War Department, including the General Staff, and in every other department and force in the Government that added to the success of our arms, accomplished more in less time than any other forces that were ever organized in the history of the world. Their achievements are bewildering, their accomplishments incomparable, and, sirs, I have offered these suggestions and the resolution that passed the Senate the other day, not because of any desire to detract from these splendid achievements in this great work, but in the hope that this proud record will not be blemished at this time by unwise and unfair action. I have offered it in the hope that a changed and just policy of demotion will be adopted by the General Staff as a substitute for the illogical and unreasonable and highly discriminatory plan now being followed.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I understand it is proposed to put over the pending bill until Monday, and it is for that reason that I rise to express my mind briefly upon the procedure of the Senate.

The bill known as the retirement bill has been before the Senate, its unfinished business, for several days. It could have been disposed of long ago if it alone had been considered in the discussion before the Senate. On yesterday at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m. the Senate took a recess until to-day at 12 o'clock, the object being to shut out morning business so that the time of the Senate could be devoted to the bill under consideration. It is now 3.45 o'clock, but not one word has been said on the bill before the Senate, and circumstances have been so forced that it can not be considered during the remainder of the afternoon.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States has been condemned throughout the country—and, I think, unjustly as a general rule—because of delays, prolonged discussion, and so-called general debate. I am in favor of unlimited debate on any matter which may be pending before the Senate, but I am very much opposed to the injection into the debate on a question which has been made the regular order of business of matters that are not pertinent. We could well afford to follow the practice of the British Parliament in this respect. There debate is free and open, but it is always confined to the matter before the Parliament. Here, however, when we succeed in making a bill the unfinished business, it simply opens the door for such discussion as we have witnessed this day.

Undoubtedly there must be certain general discussion, but it ought to be brought forward at the proper time; and I shall be glad to support hereafter any proposition which shall limit debate to the question before the Senate.

The Senate is tired. I have no doubt about that. It has been in almost constant session for many, many months—for years, in fact—and I realize that other Senators, like myself, are busy in committee work. But, sir, one of the reasons why we do not have a better attendance upon the meetings of the Senate is that no Senator knows what is to be discussed. He is not certain, because a measure is before the Senate, that it will be considered; but any Senator who takes it into his head to discuss some other question rises and occupies the time of the Senate, and the Senators lose interest in the matter under discussion.

There are many other deductions of a similar nature that can be made from this particular fact. I think it is wrong. I repeat that I want unlimited debate upon any matter before the Senate, and I will not vote for cloture, because I think unlimited debate is generally enlightening, and I know that sometimes deliberation, although it may not be in the highest sense intelligent, does make for good laws. This bill, however, ought to be either voted up or voted down. After Senators had talked about almost everything else on yesterday, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] rose and suggested that the bill be recommitted to the committee for still further delay. If, by that, it is meant to put it where it will be killed, perhaps that may be an indirect and painless way of accomplishing that end; but I feel very deeply about this, because I try hard to attend the meetings of the Senate, and yet I am overwhelmed with committee work, too. I would like, however, to feel that when a measure is before the Senate I could come in here and hear it discussed.

Another thing: Suppose, for instance, I am obliged to remain out of the Senate during the discussion of a measure, and I want to read the discussion in the RECORD. How will I find what has been said on any particular bill? In looking over the proceedings of the day when a certain measure is the order of business, I find discussion of everything else but the bill that I am looking for. In the interest of orderly procedure, of good legislation, of wise legislation, the Senate ought to adopt a rule confining the discussion in the Senate to the matter before it.

I know the arguments against that proposition; but I propose, if no one else does, to offer an amendment to the rules providing for this particular thing. I know it will make for better attendance upon the Senate. I know it will make for better legislation. It will expedite the business of the Senate. Here we go on with a measure, and somebody injects into the RECORD a speech that does not pertain to the measure at all. The Senate Chamber empties at once. Nobody is interested in that, because nothing is to be acted upon. The result is that the same arguments have to be gone over and over and over again, with the same interrogatories, the same interruptions on the part of Senators, that occurred in the first place.

I repeat what I have said on other occasions: If a bill ought not to pass, it ought to be voted down. When all the debate has been exhausted on that particular subject, then comes the time to vote; and how quickly you could exhaust debate if you confined it to the matter under consideration. You would need no cloture. If every Senator knew that he must confine his talk to the matter under discussion and consideration, debate would close of itself, and the Senate would be ready to act, and we would have such matters disposed of and put behind us.

So, Mr. President, I have said this, and I would not have injected it if there were any thought of considering the bill which is before the Senate this afternoon. I understand, however, that there is none, although that is what we took the recess for yesterday. Think of it! We recessed instead of adjourning yesterday, in order that we could confine the time of the Senate to this bill; yet, up to this hour, not a minute has been devoted to the question before the Senate.

Mr. President, no wonder the country gets tired of this interminable, indefinite debate, not upon matters before the Senate, but upon other subjects which Senators feel are important to them. Most of the time this morning was devoted to the discussion of a measure that probably will come before the Senate, and then the whole argument will have to be gone over again. The time of the Senate will be wasted, devoted to repetition, because by that time the Senate will have forgotten what was said to-day on that particular bill.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be considered as a scold. I do not assume that rôle; but I do feel that it is time for the Senate to get down to the real business of the Senate, and conduct it in a businesslike way.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered a resolution requesting the Shipping Board not to sell on Monday what is known as the German fleet. Inasmuch as the Senate recessed yesterday instead of adjourning, to-day is yesterday under our rules, and that motion can not come up under the rules to-day. I am going to occupy about 5 or 10 minutes of the time of the Senate in discussing the question.

Upon consideration, I am convinced that the Shipping Board has no legal right whatever to sell these ships. On May 12, 1917, the President approved a joint resolution passed by Congress by which these ships, or some of them, were taken over and afterwards delivered to the Shipping Board. The Senate will recall that these were ships owned by German citizens, and, of course, the title to those ships was in the German citizens. In the exercise of war powers, the Congress took them over, and here are the terms under which they were taken over:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all territories and insular possessions of the United States except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag of or was under register of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and, through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the Government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, subject to the approval of the President, a board of survey, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the actual value of the vessel, its equipment, appurtenances, and all property contained therein at the time of its taking, and to make a written report of their findings to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve such report with the records of his department. These findings shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation.

Approved May 12, 1917.

The effect of that joint resolution is to establish an inchoate right in the United States to those ships. The absolute title is not definitely fixed in the United States until the treaty of peace with Germany is signed. I am talking now about the title of the United States. The effect of this joint resolution was to create what is known in law as an active trust in the Shipping Board. The Shipping Board is made the trustee of these vessels, with certain well-defined directions as to how to operate that trust, and the Shipping Board's authority is limited to four things—to operate, lease, charter, and equip the vessels. It has no power of sale. Congress never has authorized the Shipping Board to sell these vessels in this or any other general act.

Under that joint resolution the President of the United States on June 30, 1917, issued an Executive order in which he directs the Shipping Board to take over the vessels named in it, and here is what the Executive order says:

Whereas the following joint resolution adopted by Congress was approved by the President May 12, 1917:

"Joint resolution authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction, which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war, or was under register of any such nation, and for other purposes:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all territories and insular possessions of the United States except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag of or was under register of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and through the United States Shipping Board or any department or agency of the Government to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, subject to the approval of the President, a board of survey, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the actual value of the vessel, its equipment, appurtenances, and all property contained therein at the time of its taking, and to make a written report of their findings to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve such report with the records of his department. These findings shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation."

And whereas the following vessels were, at the time of coming into the jurisdiction of the United States, owned in whole or in part by a corporation, citizen, or subject of the Empire of Germany, a nation with which the United States is now at war, or were flying the flag of or under the register of the Empire of Germany or of a political subdivision or municipality thereof: Vaterland, Amerika, Kaiser Wilhelm II, President Grant, Pennsylvania, Bulgaria, Prinzess Irene, Hamburg, Neckar, Bohemia, Rhaetia, Wittekind, Armenia, Adamastarm, Willehad, Serapis, Allemannia, Nassovia, Maia, Neptun, O. J. D. Ahlers, Prinz Waldemar, Loongmoon, Governeur Jaeschke, Darvel, Princess Alice, Wiegand, Bochum, Carl Diederichsen, Coblenz, Esslingen, Lyeemoon, Pongtong, Sachsen, Suevia, Steinbeck, Elsass, Indra, Arnoldus Vinnen, Ottawa, Grunewald, Sachsenwald, Staatssekretar Solf, Aroa (lighter), George Washington, Kronprinzessin Cecile, President Lincoln, Cincinnati, Grosser Kurfurst Barbarossa, Friedrich der Grosse, Rhein, Koenig Wilhelm II, Koln, Prinz Oskar, Ockenfels, Arcadia, Pisa, Prinz Joachim, Harburg, Portonia, Clara Mennig, Pommern, Setos, Holsatia, Staatssekretar Kraetke, Borneo, Marudu, Tsintau, Andalusia, Camilla Rickmers, Clara Jebsen, Elmshorn, Johanne, Mark, Rajah, Samoa, Tubingen, Dalbek, Magdeburg, Matador, Kurt, Andromeda, Prinz Sigismund, Savoia, Arni (lighter), Argus (lighter).

It is therefore ordered that through the United States Shipping Board there be taken over to the United States the possession and title of the aforementioned vessels. The United States Shipping Board is further hereby authorized to repair, equip, and man the said vessels; to operate, lease, or charter the same in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise; and to do and perform any and all things that may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the joint resolution above set forth.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 30, 1917.

That is all that there is in our law on the subject of the German vessels; and, as I said before, it constitutes the Shipping Board as the trustee of an active trust, with certain well-specified duties. It has no authority of any kind, nature, or description to sell these vessels, and the proposed sale of them by the Shipping Board is without any authority of law; and, in my judgment, if it is attempted to be carried out, any citizen will have the right to stop it, and it ought to be stopped. I think it is a high-handed piece of action upon the part of the Shipping Board, and I greatly regret that under our rules to-day is yesterday and we can not take up the resolution and direct the Shipping Board not to dispose of these ships.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCORMICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did not the act creating the Shipping Board give it power to buy, build, and sell ships?

Mr. McKELLAR. It gave it the right to buy and build and, under certain conditions, to sell. The act creating the Shipping Board was passed a year before the war began, or about that time. It can not have any application to ships that were taken under war powers, under a specific joint resolution of Congress dealing with the subject of those ships thus taken from Germany under war; and those ships can only be used or disposed of under such terms as Congress has already laid down or may lay down in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I read the act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I have read the act myself. I read much better than I hear. Mr. President, the original act creating the Shipping Board gave it power to buy, build, and sell ships. At the time that power was conferred upon the Shipping Board, of course, there was not a single ship that had been bought or had been built or could be then sold. It must have referred to ships to come after that time under the direction and jurisdiction of the Shipping Board. There was not one word in the original act that confined its powers so that it would have no authority over ships captured during war, if war should come. The act was passed in anticipation of war, and was passed partially with the idea at that time, as I happen to know, that perhaps the German ships lying in our harbors might be acquired by purchase, and if we went to war they might be acquired otherwise.

The point I was trying to make by the question was that the jurisdiction conferred upon the Shipping Board was as broad to add selling powers as to add its buying or building powers, and that the whole thing was in futuro and related to something which would take place in the future, and nothing which at that time had already taken place.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is wholly mistaken, in my judgment, about the legal effect of the act mentioned. Whatever may have been the power of the Shipping Board in other matters, the Shipping Board did not acquire title to these German vessels confessedly by reason of the Shipping Board act. It only acquired title under the joint resolution approved May 12, 1917. It got title from no other source. It is not empowered to receive title from any other source except title from the owners of the ships, which confessedly never has been given, and under the authority under which it received the ships, this is the only power that it had over those ships, and I quote—

Through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the Government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessels in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

If Congress had intended that the board should have the right to sell those ships or other ships, it would have given them the right and authority in the act. The Shipping Board could only receive title under that resolution. It would have no right even to take over the German vessels if that resolution had not been passed. All of its title comes under the joint resolution, all its acts in regard to these ships must come under the joint resolution, and it is idle to talk about some law passed before having given it any further right than is given in the joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is true that the Shipping Board acquired title to the possession—or acquired possession, rather, because it never acquired title in a real sense—to these ships by an act of Congress turning the ships over to the Shipping Board. But when the ships were turned over to the Shipping Board they were turned over to it as the Shipping Board was constituted by law, with certain powers of disposition, of acquisition, of operation. When Congress turned the ships over to the Shipping Board it was merely a method of saying that the jus disponendi of these ships, the jus operandi of them, is hereby transferred by the Federal Government to the Shipping Board, and it is no more cogent or logical to argue that that act was passed long after the original jurisdiction of the Shipping Board over whatsoever there might be turned over to it was effected than it would be to say that the ships built at Philadelphia or elsewhere, having been built long afterwards, were not referred to in the original act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator's argument is to my mind wholly erroneous. I say that with perfect respect. He may be entirely correct about it and I may be entirely incorrect about it. But it will be remembered that the ships did not belong to the United States Government. The United States Government was simply a trustee for them in law. They do not belong to the United States Government to-day, and can not belong to the United States Government until we get a title to them. We have possession——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. We have possession of them, but we have not any title to the ships, and we can not have title to the ships until the treaty of peace is signed with Germany by which we obtain the title. We have now under discussion in this body a treaty of peace under which the United States acquires title to these ships, but until she acquires title to them, of course, she is holding them as a trustee and the Shipping Board is holding them as a trustee of the parties. The joint resolution under which these ships were taken specifically states the terms upon which they may be held, and there are no terms there that the Shipping Board or that the United States may sell them. Of course, it was not intended that we should sell them. Never until a new administration of the Shipping Board came in a short time ago was it believed by any man in the country that we were going to sell these German ships that had come to us through the fortunes of war. I do not believe there is one person in 10 in the United States who thinks that they ought to be sold.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word more, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know how many men in America there are who think as I do, nor do I care. What I am striving for now is to determine whether or not what I think is right. The Senator says the United States has no title to the ships. It is true that that title may subsequently be modified or even surrendered by the terms of the treaty of peace, but ad interim after the capture and until the treaty of peace the ships belong to the captors, in possession and in title. They could not belong to anybody else, and the captors have a right to dispose of them subject to whatever agreement may be made later on in a treaty of peace modifying, amending, or nullifying whatever they may have done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment and I will yield to the Senator from Florida.

The answer to that argument is this: As everybody in the country knows, these ships were not captured in the usual way in a war. The fact is that the ships were interned in our ports when we were a neutral. We held them as trustee under international law——

Mr. WILLIAMS. As long as we were neutral.

Mr. McKELLAR. For many months, and until we entered the war ourselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We held them as trustee——

Mr. McKELLAR. One moment, please. Then after about six months—to be exact, I think about four months and a half—we concluded with reference to the ships that we have been holding as trustees for a belligerent that we would take them over ourselves. We took them over under this joint resolution. The only right we have to use them is under the joint resolution; the only right the Shipping Board has is under the joint resolution. It would have no right to take charge of the ships if it had not been for the joint resolution. The only authority of law that the Shipping Board has to dispose of them is under the joint resolution, and I say that the joint resolution does not give them the slightest authority. It does seem to me that the head of the Shipping Board should never have undertaken to sell the ships under the plain mandate of this law without having applied to Congress for authority to sell them.

Yesterday in a hearing before the Committee on Commerce Mr. Payne testified that he had no Executive order to sell the ships. I do not think the President is authorized to issue an Executive order to sell them, because the President's connection with the ships and his authority over the ships depends upon the joint resolution, and the joint resolution creates what all of us lawyers know to be an active trust; and the trustee can not go beyond the terms of the active trust when they are set out in the trust instrument.

I yield now to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Florida will pardon me, the Senator refers to "us lawyers." I have the misfortune of being one of them, perhaps not as prominent as he in any respect, but I do know something about international law. I know that while a neutral nation holds interned ships as a trustee and possesses no right, no title, except the bare possession, the moment the neutral nation becomes a belligerent enemy nation to the nation owning the ships, the taking possession of those ships is an act of capture as complete as taking possession of a ship at sea, and no one of us lawyers who knows any law will dispute that proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that were the case, why did our representatives in Paris, in whom I have very great confidence—several of them, I think, were lawyers—say we will just perfect our title in these ships by treaty? What is the use of that? If we have possession and title, why in the name of Heaven did we go to work and get a paper title to them under the treaty? It would be a very foolish thing to do if that is the case. But I do not agree with the Senator. I know very little about international law, but I do know that the United States' rights to those ships under the peculiar methods under which they were taken is an inchoate one, and the legal title to them is not perfect in the United States until the treaty of peace is signed, and we have a provision in the treaty for that very purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The title is not inchoate, although it is defeasible. The question which the Senator asks is very easily answered. Why should they have mentioned ships in connection with the treaty of peace if they had a perfect title? It is because during a war everything done—territory captured, ships captured, prisoners retained in prison camps of the belligerent countries—comes up for final consideration and disposition, so that there may be added to the acts of war and the rights of war an agreement of peace. Whatever may have been the rights of the German Empire to any American ship caught accidentally in Hamburg at the time of the declaration of war or any German ship caught accidentally in New York at that time, the whole thing had to be passed upon, together with all the other subjects matter that concern the war in the final treaty of peace. If we had been defeated in the war, undoubtedly we would have had to return the ships or their value, just as Germany, defeated, must return our ships or their value, if we had any that they took. But the right pendente bello attached and became not only a right of possession but a title during the war, and the trusteeship ceased with our neutrality and became a right by capture when we took possession as a belligerent power.

Mr. McKELLAR. The trouble with the Senator's argument is that Congress has decreed otherwise. The Congress, which has supreme control over those ships, has decreed by this joint resolution in language just as plain as that in which any matter could be expressed, that its agency called the Shipping Board shall act as trustee in regard to these ships, and whatever may be the power of the United States Government over them, the Shipping Board, which is an arm of the Government only, an agent of the Government only, has been confined to certain well-defined powers and duties with respect to those ships, and those powers and those duties do not include the right to sell.

That is all there is in it. The board is prohibited from selling the ships, under the plain terms of the act of Congress, and I say that it is an assumption of authority, an improper assumption of authority, for the Shipping Board to undertake to sell those ships without getting authority from the Congress of the United States, and I do not believe such a sale would be legal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator read that part of the act which prohibits the Shipping Board from selling them? I understand his contention to be that they were not affirmatively granted the right——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment; let me answer the question. Where a trustee is given specific powers and duties it is prohibited from exercising any other powers or duties except those mentioned in the trust instrument, and every lawyer knows that to be the law.

I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I came into the Chamber just as the Senator was discussing the question of the title to the ships, and I am not sure whether he has referred to the joint resolution of May 12, 1917, authorizing the seizure of the German ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. I read it in full into the RECORD, and then I read into the RECORD the Executive order of the President in reference thereto, showing in both instances that the Shipping Board was confined in its powers and duties and had no right to sell either under an Executive order or under the original resolution itself. Of course, the Executive order could not go further than the power under which the Executive order was issued, which is the joint resolution of Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. I heard that portion of the Senator's argument, but I thought he was taking the position that there was some question about our title to the ships. I would differ with him as to that. Notwithstanding this subject may be covered by the peace treaty, which covers also all alien enemy property which does not refer to shipping, and provides that there shall be acquiescence in all we have done in respect to alien property in this country, that does not, in my judgment, affect the proposition that we have title to these ships.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say, if the Senator from Florida will permit an interruption——

Mr. McKELLAR. We have an inchoate right to the ships.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to make this interruption, because I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not committing myself to the proposition that the Shipping Board ought to sell these ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite understand that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator does understand that. That is a question about which I know very little, and that I have not fully studied. I think if they are not selling them at their value, they ought to be doing so. I was merely controverting the position that they had no right to sell them.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Mississippi in his position as to the title of the United States. The joint resolution itself provides (40 Stat. L., 75):

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel—

And so forth.

Following that the President, by Executive order, directed—

That through the United States Shipping Board there be taken over to the United States the possession and title of the aforementioned vessels.

He then sets out some 81 vessels, describing them, and I think unquestionably in pursuance of the joint resolution and the Executive order the possession and title of the ships rests in the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. In just a moment. With reference to the purpose of the Government in the matter of the use of those ships and the authority of the Shipping Board, the joint resolution provided, further, that—

Through the United States Shipping Board or any department or agency of the Government to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

That is the language of the joint resolution. The authority is there given to take over the possession and title of the ships for the purpose of operating them, leasing them, chartering them, and equipping them in the service of the United States, and the order itself provides that—

The United States Shipping Board is further hereby authorized to repair, equip, and man the said vessels; to operate, lease, or charter the same in any service of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean to say that, with that limited authority, in his judgment the Shipping Board has the right to sell these ships?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am just coming to that. I say there are the express provisions of the joint resolution and of the order to charter, lease, equip, and operate the ships. There is no provision in the resolution itself or any order with respect to selling the ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have just stated that.

Mr. FLETCHER. So it seems to me that we must look somewhere else for the authority than in the joint resolution or in the order. Whether or not the authority given in the appropriation acts covers these ships is a question which the Senator might look into. My first impression now is that the various appropriation acts refer to the construction and acquiring of ships, the disposition of the ships as contemplated under the act, and that these German ships were not included. Whether there has been any further order made in reference to these ships or not I am not advised, but it does seem to me that there must be some further order made under the authority given in the appropriation act before there can be any right to sell the ships, because under the shipping act of 1916 the authority to sell ships is confined to the ships constructed or acquired in pursuance of that act. Consequently, it seems to me, there is no authority in the Shipping Board to sell these ships unless it comes in pursuance of legislative enactment set forth in the appropriation acts which gave to the President the power to acquire or dispose of the ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know that I gathered just what position the Senator intends to take. If he intends to take the position that the Shipping Board has no right to sell these ships under the act of Congress, I agree with him entirely. If he attempts to take the position that it does have the right under any act, I differ with him entirely.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to make it plain; that was the purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may have done so, but I am unable to understand the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to make it plain that the Government has title to these ships under the resolution and under the Executive order. That is what I want to make plain. I understood the Senator to question that. I think beyond any doubt the Government has the possession of and the title to the ships.

I desire to make it plain, further, that under this resolution and under the Executive order there is no authority to sell the ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator agrees with me to that extent; but so far as the title to the ships is concerned I merely desire to say a word. The title which the Government has, of course, is an inchoate title, or what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] called a defeasible title. We all recognize that. If the war had gone the other way, the Government would not have any title at all; everybody knows that. The United States could only give such title as it had. It had an inchoate title to the ships; or an inchoate right to them is a better method of expressing it. It had a defeasible title to them only. When it transferred that title to the Shipping Board it, of course, only transferred such title as it had. So it is all a mere play upon words as to what we call "title." That is all I care to say in reference to the matter. I merely wanted to call it to the attention of the Senate.

I ask that a statement by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] in reference to this subject may be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

NO POWER TO SELL.

"Senator ASHURST said too much emphasis could not be placed on the fact that the joint resolution 'gave the Shipping Board no power to dispose of the ships; that it merely empowered the board to "operate, lease, charter and equip them."'

"'In attempting to sell the ex-German ships the board is, therefore, attempting to exercise a power it does not possess. Any attempt by it to exercise such a power would, indeed, be "acting ultra vires,"' Senator ASHURST said. 'No construction can be placed on the joint resolution which would justify the proposed sale by the board of ex-German ships which were turned over to it by Congress in the name of the American people.'

"After looking into the law, Senator ASHURST said he desired also to emphasize the distinction between the right of the Shipping Board to sell ships of its own construction and its complete lack of power to dispose of the ex-German ships, which it did not construct.

"Under the act of Congress of September 7, 1916, creating the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation the board 'may charter, lease, or sell' to citizens of the United States such vessels as it constructed or constructs, but under the joint resolution providing for the seizure of the ex-German ships the word 'sell' was purposely omitted, Senator ASHURST pointed out.

CALLS SILENCE NEGATION.

"'The joint resolution specifically refrains from using the word "sell,"' the Senator said. 'Could its meaning or purpose be made any clearer? Certainly, under such circumstances, silence may be regarded as negation. In other words, the right of the Shipping Board to sell the ex-German ships was specifically refused or denied by Congress. There can be no legal dispute about that.'"

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a short resolution, and, if there is no objection, I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 306), as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether any, and if so, what, agreement or understanding exists between him and officials of Great Britain concerning the disposition by the United States of America of the German ships which the Shipping Board is proposing to sell, or which were acquired by the United States after the termination of hostilities between said United States and the Central European Teutonic powers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate for just a minute. I simply desire to state that I have several times heard, and from what I think is good authority, that there was some understanding between the President and Lloyd-George or some member of the British Government in relation to the disposition of the German ships or the proceeds derived from them in case they were disposed of. I do not know whether or not that is a fact. If it is, I should like to know it, as being germane to the subject which we are now considering. I should like to have the resolution considered and agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to have the resolution again read. Being otherwise temporarily engaged, I did not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe it is usual to insert in such resolutions the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing that those words be inserted.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is, I think, a mere formality; but I believe they should go into the resolution. I know nothing at all about the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Neither do I. If the President should say the information was incompatible with the public interest, I should not ask for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the amendment to the resolution which I have suggested.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire that the resolution shall be modified as suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, to insert at the proper place the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he has received any information from a source, in his opinion, sufficiently authentic to warrant him in offering the resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. I will be very frank with the Senator. I have this information from a source in which I personally have entire confidence. I have been told that there is such an agreement and that it is in the State Department; but even if it is there, if the President says it is incompatible with the public interest to divulge the information, of course we shall not get it, and I do not ask it. I should like to know the terms of the agreement, if it exists, and if, in the opinion of the President, it is not incompatible with the public interest that we shall know it.

Mr. KING. The Senator's information is that some agreement exists that is outside of the terms of the treaty or that would be inconsistent with the terms of the treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes; I think so; entirely outside of the terms of the treaty.

Mr. McKELLAR. All I can say is that I have absolutely no knowledge of it. This is the first information I ever had to that effect. I am not going to oppose the adoption of the resolution, because I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not the knowledge in the sense of having seen any document or being party to any such agreement, but I have the information from a friend of mine, who I think is reliable, for he is a gentleman who usually knows what he talks about; but if he is mistaken about it, I see no harm in the President saying that there is no such agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Connecticut accepts the modification of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution as modified?

The resolution as modified was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 16, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 14, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we approach Thee with gratitude welling up in our hearts for a world of splendid opportunities calculated to develop the faculties of mind and soul with which Thou hast endowed us—its fertile fields, hidden treasures, laws which environ us.

Give us the grace, fortitude, willingness, to share with all mankind these treasures and overcome selfishness, egotism, wild speculations and do unto others as we would be done by, and thus live, and grow, and aspire, to the best for ourselves and all mankind. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 14, 1920, approved and signed joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 20. Joint resolution giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Richmond, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 156. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 156. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WOMAN-SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the governor of the State of Nevada, announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. YATES, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. McKINLEY, was granted leave of absence for one day, on account of illness.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11960, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11960, the Diplomatic and Consular bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have not had a chance to look over the Senate amendments, particularly the amendment with reference to the increased charge for passports, and from a hasty glance I am led to believe that it would cost $10 to go across the river into Mexico or to go across the border into Canada, and it would absolutely stop all intercourse between the United States and the people of Mexico and Canada. I do not believe that that should obtain.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is altogether wrong about that. Mexico and Canada are excepted from the provisions of the increased passport fee. The same is also true of Cuba and the Bahamas.

Mr. GARNER. The opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be right on that subject, but I would like to be assured of it, because I do not think the House desires that the going and coming between this country and Mexico and Canada should be entirely stopped. I think we should have sufficient time in which to consider the matter. If the gentleman will delay his request a little until I can look that matter up, I shall be happy.

Mr. PORTER. The Senate bill expressly excepts Mexico, Canada, Cuba, and the Bahamas. All that the gentleman from Texas has to do is to look at the bill. I hope he will not delay the appointment of the conferees.

Mr. GARNER. I just ask opportunity to be allowed to look at it. Has the gentleman consulted the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the ranking Member on the Democratic side of the committee, about the matter?

Mr. PORTER. No.

Mr. GARNER. I have insisted several times—and I am going to reiterate it now—that if the ranking Member on the Democratic side is not considered of sufficient importance to be consulted before request is made to send a bill to conference and disagree to Senate amendments, then you will have to get action otherwise than by unanimous consent.

Mr. PORTER. I misunderstood the gentleman's question. I did consult with the gentleman from Virginia about the appointment of conferees, but not about the increase of passport fees.

Mr. GARNER. I think when a gentleman gets up and asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and send the bill to conference, it ought to be done with a tacit agreement with the ranking minority Member on this side. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will look into the matter and give me assurance that his statements are confirmed as to the Senate amendments, I shall not object.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PORTER. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL of California. I notice by the provisions of the bill as passed by the Senate that not only have the exceptions named by the chairman of the committee been made but also some other exceptions, including Cuba and Bermuda. Does the gentleman indicate that his attitude is in favor of those exceptions?

Mr. PORTER. I think that Cuba should be excepted.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Does the gentleman propose to charge a poor father or mother of a boy who died in France $10 to go to France to see his grave and allow a Chicago or New York sport to go to Cuba without paying for the passport privilege?

Mr. PORTER. If the gentleman had read the House bill carefully, he would have found that the fathers and mothers, wives, children, and sisters and brothers of our soldier dead are excepted from the payment of passport fees.

Mr. RANDALL of California. The gentleman has also made an exception of Bermuda. Why give a preference to certain Latin-American countries and exclude others?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Bermuda is not a Latin-American country.

Mr. RANDALL of California. For instance, take Panama. We have an important enterprise with that country, that has granted us an exclusive right of way across its country. Nobody can go to Panama under this bill without paying $10 for a passport.

Mr. PORTER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Panama and the Canal Zone are excepted.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Panama is excepted to a certain extent. Parties going there indirectly are excepted, but parties direct from the United States to Panama will have to pay. If they go directly from the United States they will have to pay.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Unless we can have opportunity to ask the gentleman a question or two I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech of my own on Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SNELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. SNELL. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Bacharach	Dooling	Kennedy, R. I.	Rowan
Benson	Dyer	Knutson	Sanders, N. Y.
Blackmon	Eagan	Kreider	Sanford
Booher	Edmonds	Langley	Saunders, Va.

Curry, Calif.	Johnston, N. Y.	Rainey, Ala.	Yates
Dallinger	Juul	Rainey, H. T.	Zihlman
Davey	Kelley, Mich.	Reavis
Dempsey	Kendall	Reber
Donovan	Kennedy, Iowa	Reed, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On this call 331 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SNELL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned the unfinished business was the Agricultural appropriation bill, on which the previous question was ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], on page 58, line 21, reducing the appropriation reported by the committee for the protection of southern field crops from $125,000 to $101,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks a separate vote on an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, line 21, strike out "$125,000" and insert "$101,000," and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] cutting down the appropriation for hog cholera $100,000, found on page 18, line 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks for a separate vote on the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, strike out "$510,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$410,000."

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment on page 46, after line 13.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks for a separate vote on an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, after line 13, insert: "For experiments and investigations of range conditions within the national forests or elsewhere on the public range, and of methods for improving the range by reseeding, regulation of grazing, and other means, $35,000."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment on page 58, line 17.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks for a separate vote on another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, after line 17, insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the establishment of the European corn borer in Massachusetts, New York, and other States, and to provide means for the control and prevention of spread of this insect in these States or elsewhere in the United States, in cooperation with the State or States concerned, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $300,000."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. BLACK. I demand a separate vote on the Anderson amendment to insert a paragraph appropriating $192,400 for the completion, operation, and maintenance of a kelp plant at Summerland, Calif., for the manufacture of potash.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state the page on which the amendment appears?

Mr. BLACK. On page 56, line 15.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a separate vote on an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 56, after line 15, insert: "For the completion, operation, and maintenance of the Government kelp plant at Summerland, Calif, $192,000: Provided, That the product obtained from such experimentation may be sold at a price to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. HAUGEN. I withdraw my request for a separate vote on the amendment on page 46.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his demand for a separate vote on the amendment indicated by him.

Mr. RUBEY. I make the point of order that as to the amendment on which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] demands a separate vote, the item in the bill remains just exactly as the committee reported it. Therefore there can be no separate vote on that paragraph.

The SPEAKER. That question will come up when the amendment is reached. The question is on the other amendments on which no separate vote was demanded.

The question being taken, the other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment on which a separate vote is demanded by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. PURNELL. May we have it reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, line 21, strike out "$125,000" and insert "$101,000," and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUBEY. Is it not proper to take up the amendments in the order in which they come in the bill?

The SPEAKER. Either way is proper.

Mr. RUBEY. I think they ought to be voted on in the order in which they come in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The ordinary practice is to take them up in the order in which a separate vote is demanded on them, but if the gentleman desires it done in the other way, that is perfectly proper.

Mr. RUBEY. I think that would be the proper order, Mr. Speaker, and I ask that the amendment on page 18, the first one on which a separate vote is demanded, be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will comply with the gentleman's request, and will direct that the vote be taken first on that amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 1, strike out "$510,000" and insert "$410,000."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the paragraph be reported as it will read when amended.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the paragraph as it would read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the disease of hog cholera, and for its control or eradication by such means as may be necessary, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and other methods, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State or county authorities, $410,000: Provided, That of said sum $188,280 shall be available for expenditure in carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913, regulating the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, or shipment of any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product manufactured in the United States and the importation of such products intended for use in the treatment of domestic animals: And provided further, That of said sum $29,520 shall be available for researches concerning the cause, modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention of this disease.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was being taken when Mr. CARTER and Mr. RUBEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 157, answered "present" 4, not voting 102, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEELE. If he were here, he would vote "no." I wish to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MANN of Illinois). The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 56, after line 15, insert:

"For the completion, operation, and maintenance of the Government kelp plant at Summerland, Calif., $192,900: Provided, That the products obtained from such experimentation may be sold at a price to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment, upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, after line 17, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the establishment of the European corn borer in Massachusetts, New York, and other States, and to provide means for the control and prevention of the spread of this insect in these States or elsewhere in the United States, in cooperation with the State or States concerned, including rent outside the District of Columbia, the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $300,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 173, answered "present" 4, not voting 102, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I will again have to withdraw my vote of "no," and ask to be recorded present, because I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEELE.

Mr. SANDERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. SANDERS of New York. I heard it, but was not prepared to vote at the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. SANDERS of New York. I would like to be recorded as present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the remaining amendment upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, line 21, strike out "$125,000" and insert "$101,000," and strike out the remainder of the paragraph, so that the paragraph will read:

"For investigations of insects affecting southern field crop, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, and so forth, and the cigarette beetle and Argentine ant, $101,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the language proposed to be stricken out by the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, strike out "of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 173, answered "present" 4, not voting 107, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana with Mr. SISSON.

Mr. BAER with Mr. AYRES.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. WOODS of Virginia.

Mr. LUFKIN with Mr. DOOLING.

Mr. STEENERSON with Mr. BOOHER.

Mr. REED of West Virginia with Mr. O'CONNELL.

Mr. MASON with Mr. HUMPHREYS.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LEE of Georgia moves to recommit the Agricultural bill to the Committee on Agriculture, with instruction to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out, on pages 68 and 69, the following paragraph:

"Salaries and employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, telegraph and telephone service, freight and express charges, and all other necessary administrative expenses, $20,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Speaker if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] is against the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only person who arose to make a motion to recommit was the gentleman from Georgia. If anyone had arisen who was opposed to the bill, the Chair would have given such a gentleman the preference.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like the reading of the motion to be completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thought the motion had been completed. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Salaries, traveling, and other necessary expenses of employees out of the city of Washington engaged in field investigations, $168,076," and insert in lieu thereof the following, "For all necessary expenses, including salaries and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, freight and express charges, official traveling expenses, office fixtures, supplies, calculating machines, and other equipment for collecting, compiling, abstracting, analyzing, summarizing, interpreting, and publishing data relating to agriculture, including field printing of special forms or schedules, and State crop reports; for making crop and livestock estimates, including acreage, yield, number, and value, losses by diseases, insect pests, and adverse weather conditions, requirements and consumption of seeds, fertilizers, insecticides, and fungicides, and marketable surpluses on farms, by counties, recognized producing districts, and States, independently or in cooperation with other Federal and State departments and agencies, $500,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment proposed in the motion to recommit.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. On that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. That it is new legislation, that it is not authorized by law, and that it is not germane to the portion of the bill where it is offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have to ask the gentleman to be a little more particular in order to get information to the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit, to strike out the language in the bill and substitute the language of the motion, is not in order in that it contains authorizations not warranted by the organic law; that it provides for cooperation with the several States in the expenditure of this sum of money not included within the authority of the organic act; and that furthermore it is not a germane amendment to be inserted in the bill at this particular place in lieu of the language stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to have the gentleman point out the language that is not conformable to the rule.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I have not a copy of the amendment before me, but as I recall the reading of the language, it provides for some form of cooperative expenditure or work which, I submit, is not warranted under the particular activity to which this is offered as an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the Speaker that the language of the paragraph which the amendment seeks to strike out appears in full at the beginning of the amendment, and the language of the paragraph which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] seeks to insert in lieu of the matter sought to be stricken out is set forth in full on the same page with it, and an inspection of the two will very readily disclose to the Chair that the amendment provided for in the motion to recommit is not germane to the paragraph which is sought to be stricken out, and the point of order should be sustained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the motion.

The motion to recommit was again read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order that the amendment apparently seeks to strike out an amendment in the first paragraph, sought to be stricken out, which has already been agreed to by the House, namely, the appropriation of $20,000, where the original bill provided an appropriation of $25,480.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard. The present occupant of the chair is so familiar with the organic act establishing the Department of Agriculture that I feel a delicacy in even calling it to his attention. I shall therefore not read the organic act.

I hold that the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] is in order, based upon the fundamental law establishing the Department of Agriculture, and I am sure that an examination of that law and a comparison of it with the motion to recommit would show that the organic act permits the Department of Agriculture to do what is sought; that is, to make a thorough estimate of the crops of the country. That is all that the language seeks to put into this bill, to appropriate $500,000 for the purpose of making a thorough and complete estimate of all the crops of the country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not sought to permit or require cooperation with the States rather than the cooperation with the States Relations Service?

Mr. RUBEY. It says "either independently or in cooperation."

Mr. WALSH. With the States?

Mr. RUBEY. The Government may do it either independently or in cooperation with the States and the various subdivisions thereof. I do not think there can be any objection on that particular ground.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is prepared to rule. The provision in the bill which is sought to be amended comes under the heading of "Bureau of Crop Estimates" and under a subheading "General Expenses, Bureau of Crop Estimates." The first item under the subheading is:

For all necessary expenses, in cooperation with the States Relations Service, for collecting, compiling, abstracting, analyzing, summarizing, and interpreting data relating to agriculture; for making and publishing periodically crop and live-stock estimates, including acreage, yield, and value of farm products, as follows.

Following that comes the language which is proposed to be stricken out and a substitute offered therefor.

Salaries and employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; supplies, telegraph and telephone service, freight and express charges, and all other necessary miscellaneous administrative expenses, $20,000.

It will be noticed that the paragraph proposed to be stricken out relates only to the payment of salaries, purchase of supplies, telephone and telegraph service, freight and other miscellaneous expenses, and does not in any wise whatever undertake to determine the character of the work to be performed.

The substitute proposed by the amendment undertakes to provide for all necessary expenses, and so forth, and then provides in a great many words the character of the work to be performed, which the Chair thinks is in no way germane to the proposition in the original bill providing for the payment of certain expenses; and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer a motion to recommit, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MADDEN. On that I move the previous question.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman from Georgia has moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LEE of Georgia moves to recommit the Agricultural appropriation bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out, on page 69, line 3, the figures "$168,076" and insert in lieu thereof "$234,040."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the paragraph of the bill be read so that we may know what we are voting on. This motion strikes out certain figures, without stating what they relate to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the paragraph in the bill and then report the proposed motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 69, lines 1, 2, and 3:

"Salaries, travel, and other necessary expenses of employees out of city of Washington engaged in field investigations, $168,076."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now the Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out on page 69, line 3, the figures "$168,076" and insert in lieu thereof "$234,040."

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RUBEY demanded a division.

Pending the division,

Mr. LEE of Georgia demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 206, answered "present" 1, not voting 108, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. GOODALL with Mr. BLAND of Missouri.

Mr. LUCE with Mr. BRINSON.

Mr. MCARTHUR with Mr. CARSS.

Mr. OGDEN with Mr. DUPRÉ.

Mr. PARKER with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. ROWE with Mr. HOEY.

Mr. SNELL with Mr. JONES of Texas.

Mr. SWOPE with Mr. PHELAN.

Mr. VARE with Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. HARRELD with Mr. WOODS of Virginia.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote aye.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. HARRELD. I was not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this Agricultural appropriation bill by inserting a telegram from some stockmen in my district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Hon. T. W. Gray, who sends this telegram, is a pioneer of our State and one of the most prominent stockmen and best citizens of Colorado, and I know his telegram reflects the sentiment of thousands of stockmen throughout Colorado as well as the West generally. This telegram has reference to the grazing provision of the bill, which was stricken out, and the amendment that was adopted by the committee, appearing at page 2777 of the RECORD of February 11. The telegram is as follows:

GUNNISON, COLO., February 13, 1920.

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

That part of the Agricultural appropriation bill that places the grazing of national forest on a commercial basis in 1921 puts the small stockman out of business and is absolutely for the benefit of the big interests that want to get control of the grazing of the national forest. On behalf of Gunnison County Stock Growers' Association, I protest against the passage of that part of the bill or the raising of the grazing fee in any manner.

T. W. GRAY,
Chairman of the Advisory Board.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the correspondence between the President of the United States and the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the correspondence between the President of the United States and the former Secretary of State. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK and Mr. BLANTON objected.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to insert the correspondence in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12467) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and one hour by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the Military Academy bill be confined to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one hour by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention of the gentleman on the Republican side of the House, after this bill is concluded, to take up the Sells bill, granting pensions to Spanish War veterans and their widows, which was passed over yesterday, it being pension day?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge upon that subject and can not answer the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12467, the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, in a short while it is humanly certain that the subject of railroad legislation will come again before the House of Representatives, at which time there will possibly be a renewal of extended discussion. However, before that subject is again presented to us for consideration, I desire to put on record my own conclusion, deduced after I have had full opportunity to study and digest the voluminous, varied, and even diametrically opposed views to which the railroad problem has given birth.

I am not impelled to this course by any sort of egotistical conviction that I can add a new thought or find a fresh solution of this vexed question. I am speaking solely because I believe that on this or any other matter of legislation it is the duty of every Member of this body, after he has reached a conscientious and careful conclusion, to make it a matter of public record, so that in a multitude of honest counselors there may be found wisdom.

We are living in days when sincerity of expressed belief is more needed than ever. Even the man who thinks wrongly, and is brave enough to give utterance to his thought, is a safer and more estimable citizen than the one who thinks rightly and keeps silent for some sinister or selfish reason. It is the eternal difference between an open offender and a secret conspirator—the frank enemy and the hypocritical friend. Mr. Chairman, I regard the railroad problem as the most immediate and gravest that is now before the Congress of the United States. It is the insistent problem of the hour, and should be paramount in thought and consideration. It includes within its scope the interests of capital of $20,000,000,000 invested in 263,928 miles of trackage and equipment; the unquestioned rights of labor, comprehending the welfare of more than 4,000,000 with their families; together with the interests, indeed, of the whole country, comprising 110,000,000 people. The great agricultural interests depend upon it, which means the food supply of the Nation. The fate of millions of babies in our large cities depends upon the farm for the milk which alone enables them to live and upon the railroads to transport it. Millions of full-grown people who live therein as well depend for their lives upon the constant functioning of the railroads for the products of the farm from which comes their food supply. The factory, the forge, the mill, and the mine—in simple truth, all of the varied energies of the whole people—are contingent upon the operation and the effective running of the engine and the freight and passenger cars. They perform the same function in the body politic which the heart and the arteries and the veins constitute in the human body. It is evident, therefore, that no power should be permitted to be exercised to prevent the uninterrupted flowing of the life energies of the Nation, free, unrestrained, and unimpeded. Poor would be the life and precarious the existence of a human being if the flow of blood through his body was in the control of another who might cherish a design to arrest it. It is simply the truth to say that by the railroads we live and move and have our national being. It is plain that this question is of absolute national consequence—the greatest good of all the people.

If these facts are true—irrefutably, incontrovertibly, true—it follows with all the power of plain common sense and logic that the railroads are as much a national function as the Post Office Department, the War Department, the Navy Department, or any other department of the Federal Government. I desire to emphasize the following thought and call the attention of the House to one outstanding fact which must be considered hereafter as the foundation fact connected with the matter of railroads, and that is that by common consent there is no longer, there never will be again, such a thing in this country as private ownership of railroads. The most that can be done is to secure private management under Government control.

I make this statement confidently, solely because of the facts that have developed during the last several months since this question has become a paramount issue.

About every formal plan that has been submitted to the public and to Congress for the solution of the railroad question comprehends the exercise of certain Government powers, which, when considered with open eyes, reveal the fact that hereafter the railroads of the country, if they are not under actual Government ownership, at least they will be under private management with supreme Government control. I ask the indulgence of the House to use a very easily understood and commonplace illustration to make clear those Government powers which both the Esch bill and the Cummins bill assume to be within the purview of congressional action and to be immediately necessary as well for the purpose of solving this problem.

Take the following illustration: I will assume, by his courtesy, that the gentleman from Wisconsin, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, owns a shoe store, with a building and land and stock. In some way I become possessed of the power to walk into his store and say to him, "Keep your books hereafter according to this plan which I hand you." Secondly, I have the power to say to him, "If you need any money for the enlargement of your stock or of your building or for any purpose connected with your business, you must come to me and get permission to borrow this money, and you must state exactly and specifically what you want the money for, and if you get my permission you must spend the money which I permit you to borrow for the specific purpose for which you said you borrowed it." My third order to him is, "Do not sell anything out of this store unless I fix the price."

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I submit that if the distinguished chairman of the committee or any one of you had a business of that kind and I or anyone else possessed such three outstanding powers, you would not be very much of an owner; you would be more of a manager; and if anyone could think to the contrary I can only say that such a man would be very well satisfied with an assumption of facts.

This statement of facts, after much thinking, leads me also to another conclusion—and that is that if the Government is to assume and exercise these three powers, of necessity, logically and righteously, the Government should stabilize or guarantee the railroad stocks. It would be a most illogical and preposterous thing for the Government, without such guaranty, to assume control of $20,000,000,000 of private property, to prescribe freight rates and passenger rates, by which alone the railroads live and prosper, which rates, if too low, would run the companies into debt, and thereby produce all sorts of troubles, not the least of which would be those arising from the labor employed upon them. In other words, the Government, in justice and reason, should make good the mistakes of its own officials if invested with such power.

As to what amount of guaranty should be placed upon the stocks, whether there should be a greater guaranty for some railroads than for some others, and many other details dealing with this problem, I do not know. I do not desire to pose as an expert. I am only trying to think things out the best I can with the sure consolation of knowing that I have plenty of company, as far as fogginess or confusion of mind is concerned, on the part of those dealing with this subject.

Another outstanding fact is that there must be some way not only to stabilize railroad capital but railroad labor. There is no question but that sooner or later strikes on railroads must be minimized in some way. My judgment is that the very fact of railroads being held up by strikes will ultimately cause the American people to demand Government ownership as the only way to avert them. I desire to say frankly that this view of mine is in no sense antagonistic to the just rights of the railroad men. For the purpose of self-thinking by railroad men, themselves having been through a long lifetime friendly to every righteous demand that labor has made, whether organized or unorganized, I ask every one of them to consider the following: Suppose the Plumb plan were in operation and the complete ownership and the entire management of railroads were in Government hands and administered just as the Post Office Department is administered, or commanded as the Army or Navy is commanded, or directed just as every employee of the Government in the country or out of it is directed, would it be possible for railroad strikes to happen under such circumstances? Would not every railroad employee be subject to orders just as the soldier, the sailor, or the marine, the employees of the Post Office Department, or the thousands of clerks in the various departments and bureaus of the Government? A thought I wish to emphasize is that the liberty of action of every individual is limited according to the reason and the necessities involved in each case. If the railroads of the country are ever owned and controlled absolutely as a governmental function, a railroad strike would become a strike at the Government and therefore an act of treason. My conviction is that both railroad capital and railroad labor must be equitably considered and safeguarded, but always by law. My conviction is that just as a fair return should be guaranteed to railroad capital, provided the Government fixes the freight rates and the passenger rates, so there should be an adequate wage guaranteed for railroad labor, the right of the one being just as great as the right of the other. Without stabilizing capital in railroads they can not borrow money, no new expenditures for new lines can be had, and no proper maintenance for those already existing—in fact, an actual paralysis of transportation will ensue affecting the whole people, until finally, and in truth very soon, they will cry out in their need and desperation, "Give us Government ownership," not because they want it, but because the railroads are an absolute necessity to the life of the Nation and must be run. I emphatically oppose Government ownership of the railroads because of a profound conviction that such ownership is the first tremendous stride on the road to socialism. If this country really desires to preserve its Government in its present form, it will grapple with the railroad question courageously, it will shake the sand out of its eyes, it will look fairly and clearly in the face the two supreme points for settlement I have mentioned, and stabilize both capital and labor by guaranteeing a fair return on railroad capital and a fair return to the railroad employee for his labor, but always by law, by supreme and majestic law, so that neither capital nor labor shall imperil, impair, or interfere with that function by which the country moves and has its being.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, railroad stocks should be guaranteed by the Government in order to stabilize the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Government function that ultimately shall have power and jurisdiction over the fixing of freight and passenger rates. Hitherto—I refer to prewar times—the Interstate Commerce Commission was subject to every storm that blew, whether from industrial, agricultural, or public quarters. If, however, the Interstate Commerce Commission has always in mind a Government guaranty of a fixed return, then when exorbitant demands are made by anyone the whole country will be interested to see that the railroads are not treated unfairly, because by the guaranty the increased charges may be thrown directly on the country at large by increased taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the utter incompetence, inefficiency, and criminal disregard of the interests of the people of the United States by the present administration and its agents can find no better illustration than in its mismanagement of the American sugar problem during the last six months.

The present administration and its agents have contributed most materially to the increased cost of living and in some cases have protected rather than prosecuted the profiteers.

The gross mismanagement of the sugar problem alone has led to an increase in the cost of living to the American people for the ensuing year of between $700,000,000 and $900,000,000, and has been accompanied by the most atrocious and most shameless profiteering known in this era of extortionate oppression.

Sugar was sold uniformly at retail during most of 1919 at the price of 10 cents and 11 cents per pound. It is now being sold at retail at from 18 cents to 22 cents per pound, and some in excess of this figure. As every 2 cents increase per pound is an increase in cost to the American people of $180,000,000 per annum, an increase of 10 cents is an increase in price of $900,000,000 per annum. Most of this increase in the price of this necessity and the resulting increase in the cost of living to the American people is chargeable entirely to the President of the United States and to his agent, the Attorney General.

The executive presidential department can not be investigated by Congress, but the conduct of the Attorney General can be and should be investigated at once as to his indefensible action in relation to this question, and I have filed to-day an order of investigation.

During 1919 the Sugar Equalization Board, of which George Zabriskie was head and of which corporation the President of the United States held all the stock, purchased the Cuban crop with the consent of the President for 5½ cents per pound, and as a result the cost of sugar at retail in the United States was 10 cents and 11 cents per pound, for the price of the Cuban crop fixes the price of sugar in the United States. Last August and last September in two communications the Sugar Equalization Board warned the President of a great shortage in sugar for 1920 and a great increase in the price of sugar if he did not assent to the purchase of the 1920 Cuban crop, which the Equalization Board said could be purchased at 6½ cents because of an offer by the Cuban Government. Had permission been granted by the President to do as the Sugar Equalization Board advised, the price of sugar to the American people for 1920 would have been but little in advance of that maintaining during most of 1919. The President refused his permission.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not yield, but I shall be glad to answer any questions at the end of my statement.

The Attorney General on November 8 last, when sugar was selling at between 11 cents and 12 cents per pound at retail, by his own admission, agreed with the Louisiana sugar producers to allow them to charge 17 cents and 18 cents for their sugar at the plantation. The Attorney General, if he had made no agreement with the Louisiana sugar producers, would have kept the price of the Cuban crop at a reasonable figure, whereas by his action, which I shall prove was entirely illegal from his own admissions, the Cuban crop has advanced to unheard-of prices, from 6½ cents per pound to 11½ cents and 12½ cents per pound at the plantation.

George Zabriskie, head of the Sugar Equalization Board, stated to the New York Globe on December 24, and the statement was repeated in the Literary Digest of January 10, and has not been contradicted, that he was helpless to stop "the worst orgy of profiteering from which the country has thus far suffered," and further stated:

The sugar situation is now hopeless, for the reason that it has got into politics, and the sooner it gets out the better. The ridiculous price of 17 cents wholesale for the raw sugar now charged by the Louisiana planters is an outrage. I can't say that Attorney General Palmer fixed the price, but it was known in Louisiana that he would stand for it.

It was known, furthermore, that he approved it. It was this folly that inspired the Cubans to make their gouge. When they saw American sugar planters getting away with 17 cents they decided it was perfectly legitimate for them to get some of the plunder, and to-day the people are paying the price for the Attorney General's mistake.

Had the Sugar Equalization Board been permitted to exercise its own judgment, instead of the country facing a famine, as it now does, we would have had the largest crop of sugar in history at 6½ cents per pound.

This witness, one of the greatest sugar experts in America and a Government official who has had charge of the sugar problem of the United States for over a year and who was head of the Sugar Equalization Board, charges the Attorney General, categorically, with being the author of the worst orgy of profiteering which has occurred in America during or since the war, with having put the sugar question into politics and allowed an outrageous price for Louisiana sugar, and with subjecting the American public to plunderous extortion. These charges should be carefully investigated by Congress.

On December 18 the House of Representatives sent to the Attorney General certain interrogatories, the first of which was:

Whether he made, assented to, or approved in any way of the price for Louisiana sugar on the plantation of 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated?

The answers to these interrogatories were made by the Attorney General on February 6, and are now on file as a public document and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 10. The answer of the Attorney General to this interrogatory is as follows:

As to paragraph 1, I beg to state that I neither made, assented to, nor approved of the price for Louisiana sugar on the plantation of 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated.

He, however, omits in his answer the very important words, "in any way."

He then admits that he sent a telegram to the United States attorney at New Orleans in reply to one from the United States attorney, which he gives in detail. The telegram of the Attorney General is as follows:

NOVEMBER 8, 1919.

MOONEY,
United States Attorney, New Orleans, La.:

Your wire of the 8th, detailing results of conference. Consider agreed price rather high, but hereby concur in maximum fixed price of 17 cents for Louisiana plantation clarifieds, 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated. Understanding that all contracts for a higher figure to be abrogated. Further suggest, if possible, you secure an agreement in writing by authorized committee of Louisiana producers and refiners, to be used as prima facie evidence where prices are charged in excess of agreement. You are hereby instructed to immediately prosecute any violator of this agreed price.

PALMER.

For the Attorney General to say that "he has neither made, assented to, nor approved of the price for Louisiana sugar of 17 and 18 cents" by omitting the words "in any way," in view of this telegram, is for him to quibble and evade in a manner thoroughly audacious. The answer is not even responsive to the interrogatory.

By the admission of sending this telegram he confesses to having "made, assented to, and approved of the price" to any fair mind, and by the subterfuge of omitting in his answer the words "in any way" there is plain equivocation.

His further statement that "these telegrams do not mean that we fixed the price, but do mean that, under all the special circumstances existing as to the Louisiana crops, this department was willing to concede that prosecutions would be ineffectual and unsuccessful if based upon a contention that any price less than 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated was an 'excessive price' under the Lever law" is thoroughly disingenuous, as the Attorney General had no right to concede that prosecutions would be ineffectual and unsuccessful and announce that decision to the parties in interest—the Louisiana sugar producers—who had been a party to the price set or agreed upon or concurred in.

Under the law his right is restricted to confidential advice to his agent, the United States attorney, and prosecutions before a judge or jury. For the Attorney General to fix or concur in a maximum price and use this price as prima facie evidence where prices are charged in excess of that price would give him the power of saying before a trial that the defendant was guilty and then compel the defendant to go into court and prove his innocence, which is unthinkable under our present system of government and law.

That he acted illegally in agreeing to or concurring in a maximum price for Louisiana sugar without having taken any case before a judge or jury or even started prosecutions and having consulted as to price with the very parties in interest, the Louisiana sugar producers, is disclosed by the following facts:

First. The statement made by the Attorney General December 5 and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the same date, page 213:

A conference has been held this morning between representatives of the Sugar Equalization Board and the Department of Justice, in which the sugar situation was reviewed. The Department of Justice has neither the power nor the facilities with which to control the purchase or distribution of sugar. The only governmental body having this power is the Sugar Equalization Board, and its control terminates on December 31. The Congress, although requested to do so, has failed to extend the life of the board. The Department of Justice will confine its efforts in the future, as it has in the past, to the enforcement of the provisions of the Lever food-control act, as amended, by prosecuting all instances of sales of sugar for an unjust or unreasonable profit.

The Department of Justice has never attempted to fix the price of sugar. It has accepted in the past the recommendations of the Sugar Equalization Board very largely in determining maximum fair prices. The fair margins of profit allowed are those established by the Food Administration. When such determinations were made they have been communicated to the district attorneys, who were advised that any sales in excess of the maximum figure set should be considered unfair and unreasonable. The early termination of the board will make it impossible to set any definite price on sugar in the future or control its distribution. Every sale will be treated on its own merits, and in all cases where the district attorney has evidence indicating an unfair profit or withholding of sugar from the normal consumptive channels, or any discrimination in price to the manufacturer or to the jobber supplying the domestic consumer, he will proceed under the Lever food-control act.

Second. The statement of Special Assistant Attorney General Figg, representing the Attorney General, in relation to sugar, before the subcommittee of the Agricultural Committee of the Senate October 3, 1919, last, page 72, when the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. MARTIN. In the event of the Sugar Equalization Board not continuing in existence to control sugar, does the Department of Justice contemplate taking action under the food-control act now pending?

Mr. FIGG. The Department of Justice could not take action under that only in so far as individual cases of profiteering are concerned.

Mr. MARTIN. But in doing that you would have to fix a fair price?

Mr. FIGG. That would be purely a matter for the court. There would be no one in the Department of Justice to say what would be considered a fair price.

Mr. MARTIN. The amendment as to a fair price was stricken out of the bill?

Mr. FIGG. Yes; it was stricken out of the bill.

Third. The statements of the Attorney General himself before the Committee on Agriculture of this House, August 20, 1919, pages 78, 79, 82, 83, 84, and 85, when he appeared asking for amendments to the Lever control law, under which he has been acting:

Attorney General PALMER. Well, that has not been done; my proposition does not contemplate price fixing all down the line on the part of everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; section 4.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes; you take section 4, about the middle part; that it shall be unlawful "to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing with any necessaries."

Attorney General PALMER. Well, that does not contemplate an Executive price fixing; that contemplates the leaving it to a court and jury to say whether the price charged, under all the circumstances of the case, is a just and reasonable charge.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That really gives the authority to consider the question of rates and charges—and, of course, that means prices and profits—the right to consider it and interfere with business, large and small, as to prices.

Attorney General PALMER. You do not in section 4 give the Executive the right to consider the fairness or unfairness of such prices. You declare what is unlawful, that is, the charging of unfair and discriminatory and unjust and unreasonable rates; and that leaves it as a question of fact for the jury.

Let me tell you how we propose to operate that—and, to my mind, it is the only practicable method. There are two ways by which it could be done, I suppose. One is your suggestion—having a price fixed in advance by some governmental agency; you say by the President. That means by some great organization that will sweep the country from one end to the other and have its accountants and investigators and bookkeepers and workers in every line of industry engaged in finding out how much is a fair price.

I think that is impracticable, because we can not build up that kind of an organization; and if you put it in the statute book, even as an alternative, we will be met by it at every corner road, and we will be criticized for not doing it that way, which will hurt the entire morals of the enforcement of your law.

The other method is this: When a man makes an unjust and unreasonable charge, or a discriminatory and unfair price, hale him into court.

And our method, or our proposition, to determine to the satisfaction of a jury what is a fair and reasonable price, is this: We have called upon the former State food administrators, not to organize their food administration, but simply to organize in the cities and counties fair-price committees, which we have asked to be composed of a wholesaler, a retailer, a representative of labor, representatives of housewives, and representatives of the general public.

Mr. YOUNG. Simply voluntary workers?

Attorney General PALMER. Voluntary workers for the purpose of dealing with the question of what is a just and reasonable profit in that particular community; a decentralized agency for the purpose of giving the public knowledge which would be reflected in a jury box when a man is brought before a jury upon the charge of charging an unreasonable or unjust rate. We have already secured the cooperation of 36 of the Federal food administrators, and we will have most of them; some have been delayed in accepting because they are away from home, or something of that kind.

These fair-price committees are being organized in all the larger cities and counties of the country, and they are making and will make investigations which will apply to that community only.

Now, their findings are not law; their findings do not fix the price. Their findings will simply present to us the same opportunity for gathering the evidence to show what is an unjust and unfair price for that article, and if we bring a man into court who has sold at a higher price than they have announced as a fair price we can produce the same evidence that they had to convince a jury that that man is a profiteer, and if a committee of representative citizens of that character says that those men are profiteers they will not sell at that price in that community, or if they do the jury will convict them, because the same kind of sentiment will be represented in that kind of committee that is represented on a jury.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Why not this organization you are speaking of, enlisting the services of all the State organizations?

Attorney General PALMER. Because if the volunteer who is serving upon a committee knows that he is fixing a price which is prima facie evidence of the guilt of every man who sells beyond that price we can not get him to serve. He will advise us; he will fix a price, what he thinks it ought to be, with the understanding that we will take the man into court and try it out there on the same facts as presented to him; but he won't put himself in the position of prosecutor, trial judge, and executioner at the same time. You can not ever get that committee to operate. You will have to have a central committee here in Washington, appointing and directing them to operate. That can only be done in one of two ways: Either to rebuild the Federal Food Administration or to have the President place that power in the hands of the Department of Justice. And I think it would be an unthinkable thing to expect the Department of Justice, through these committees which are now serving, to fix a price which determines in advance of a trial the guilt of any man. Why, I would not take that power, because I am practically saying "you are guilty; you have to go into court and prove your innocence."

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then, if those provisions are not put in you will have no regulatory or preventive proposition at all. It is all by way of arrest and prosecution, and there will be nothing regulatory or preventive, except the effect of an arrest and a prosecution.

Attorney General PALMER. Except this volunteer scheme that I have spoken to you about, which is extralegal, I admit.

Mr. VOIGT. It looks to me as if you were given by subdivision 2 an additional weapon which you might use if you found those cases.

Attorney General PALMER. I am fearful that it is a weapon that will be a two-edged sword. We can not get it in use in time unless the President vests that power in the Department of Justice. And for the Department of Justice to use that, it is for the purpose of giving the department the power to say what is a fair price, and then we would have to say whether the man is guilty or not.

Mr. VOIGT. Some one has always had that power under section 5, and under subdivision 2 here is practically the language that is in section 5.

Attorney General PALMER. Except that it was punishable under section 5 by removal of the license so far as the wholesalers are concerned, and, indirectly, so far as the retailers are concerned. And now we propose to make it punishable by fine and imprisonment. It is quite a different thing, I take it, for an executive to determine a thing which is prima facie and entitles another officer to take away a license from a dealer, and to determine a prima facie case against him which sends him to the penitentiary.

Mr. VOIGT. Suppose he gave your department authority to act under this subdivision 2 and you found a man selling sugar at 15 cents a pound. Why couldn't you serve an order under this subdivision on that man, by authority of the President, and tell him to sell sugar not to exceed 11 or 12 cents a pound?

Attorney General PALMER. I could, if the President gave that authority to the Attorney General.

Mr. VOIGT. Wouldn't it be a good idea?

Attorney General PALMER. No; I do not think it would, because the failure of the party to do it would be punishable by fine and imprisonment. I would be depriving him of his right of trial by jury, among other things, if I told him to do that and he failed to do it.

In the case of the Louisiana sugar producers, the Attorney General, through his agent, the United States attorney at New Orleans, consulted with the sugar producers' committee, which under no aspect could be called a "fair price" committee, and, according to his own admission, concurred in a price for Louisiana sugar as a result, and authorized an agreement to be used as prima facie evidence, according to his telegram. Yet, August 20, he said before the Agricultural Committee, for the Department of Justice to fix a price, even through committees, thereby making a prima facie case, would be to determine "in advance of a trial the guilt of a man," and added: "Why, I would not take that power, because I am practically saying 'You are guilty; you have to go into court and prove your innocence.'" Yet that is the very thing he did in this case.

The telegram which the Attorney General states in his answer to the interrogatories was sent by the United States attorney at New Orleans to him November 7 in part is as follows:

* * * but as the Government is not in a position to guarantee the producer any fixed price for his crop and is necessarily limited to establishing a fair price, which virtually means a maximum price, it would be impossible to secure the consent of planters to fix the fair average price as a maximum price, because of the vast difference existing between maximum price and average price for crop.

This statement discloses that the United States attorney, agent of the Attorney General, was "establishing a fair price" which, according to all the quoted previous statements the Attorney General himself admits, was undesirable, and I assert illegal, and for which the Attorney General has given no authority of law, although the opportunity has been given him to do so.

The second interrogatory to the Attorney General asked upon "what legal authority he made, assented to, or approved of a price for Louisiana sugar," and so forth?

His answer is: "As to paragraph 2, in view of my answer to paragraph 1, I deem no further answer necessary."

As his answer to the first interrogatory was evasive and equivocal, if not irresponsive, his answer to interrogatory 2 should have disclosed his authority under the law, if he had any authority. As the very gist of the interrogatories was an inquiry as to what authority of law he had acted under, to evade the disclosure of his authority is an admission in itself that he had no authority.

In the second request in interrogatory 3 the Attorney General was asked if he had "notified Louisiana sugar producers that under laws against profiteering they would not be prosecuted if they sold yellow clarified at 17 cents per pound and plantation granulated at 18 cents per pound." His answer is: "I never notified the Louisiana sugar producers that under laws against profiteering they would not be prosecuted if they sold yellow clarified at 17 cents per pound and plantation granulated at 18 cents per pound."

The concurrence of the Attorney General in a fixed maximum price for Louisiana sugar and the publication of that information was notification, pure and simple, to the Louisiana sugar producers that they would not be prosecuted if they sold at or below this figure, and the statement by the Attorney General that he did not notify them is equivocal and evasive in spirit if not in substance.

The maximum prices fixed were near the average price, and many of the more favored and better organized plantations at these figures might make extortionate profits and yet could not be prosecuted as profiteers because of the action of the Government. This could clearly be protecting and not prosecuting the profiteers.

The Attorney General does not disclose in his answers to the interrogatories what was contained in the telegram from the United States attorney at New Orleans, November 3, mentioned in the United States attorney's telegram of November 7, nor does he disclose any facts about the conference committee who were willing to accept 14 cents and 15 cents as the price for the entire crop, also mentioned in his telegram of the same date. Nor does the Attorney General disclose that there was a conference between him and certain Louisiana officeholders here in Washington before he sent his telegram of November 8.

In view of the evasive answers of the Attorney General by his failure to disclose the complete facts bearing upon this important matter; of his refusal to state upon what authority of law he had acted; of the immunity given to possible profiteers, and finally the effect of his action upon the price of sugar in the United States, a thorough investigation should be had of this entire question. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend and extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an editorial from a publication called Facts About Sugar, of the issue of December 13, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein a certain article to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is it political?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is not; it is economic.

Mr. GARD. From what is the editorial taken?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is taken from a trade journal called Facts About Sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?

If the Attorney General was correctly quoted in the published account of his statement last week on the subject of sugar control, his remark on the failure of Congress to enact legislation in this connection evidently was an inadvertence. According to the press reports the Attorney General said that Congress had been asked to provide for a continuation of governmental control over sugar by extending the life of the Sugar Equalization Board, but had failed to do so.

An examination of the sequence of events in connection with this matter shows that Congress was not officially acquainted with the proposal for a continuation of the Sugar Equalization Board until the beginning of October, when a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, under the chairmanship of Senator MCNARY, conducted public hearings on the sugar situation following a statement and resolution brought before the Senate by Senator NEW, of Indiana, on September 27.

As early as July a resolution calling for an investigation of the sugar shortage by the Federal Trade Commission was introduced in the House, but that resolution did not contemplate action in the direction of future control.

According to information which we consider veracious the administration, early in the present year, was approached through diplomatic channels by a representative of the Cuban Government with an inquiry as to whether the United States would be interested in purchasing the 1919–20 Cuban sugar crop. Apparently no definite reply was returned to this inquiry. Later on other unofficial advances were made, it is reported, by men who enjoyed the confidence of the Cuban Government, but again without eliciting any encouraging response.

On July 16 a conference of American sugar producers adopted a recommendation that the Sugar Equalization Board be continued in existence with authority to purchase the Cuban sugar crop of 1919–20, and this was followed shortly thereafter by the adoption of a similar resolution by the beet-sugar producers of the country.

On July 29 Messrs. Hawley and Rionda, of the Cuban Producers' Committee, addressed a letter to the Sugar Equalization Board offering to negotiate the sale of the Cuban crop. In the light of present events one passage in this letter was truly prophetic. It read:

"If accepted through the continued life and active participation of your respected board—or similar body—the whole question would be greatly simplified. If, on the contrary, the opportunity to serve—not the American people alone, but the universal welfare, is for any reason, technical or otherwise, not availed of through one medium or another, there is not a community anywhere in America, in Europe, or Asia that will not feel the consequences of our failure to provide a stable price for this most necessary article of human consumption."

While no price was mentioned in this letter, it was well understood at the time that the Cuban crop, or such portion of it as the Equalization Board might wish to acquire, could have been purchased at a price of about 6.50 cents a pound, f. o. b. Cuba.

After deliberating upon this communication the Equalization Board, on August 14, one member dissenting, addressed a letter to the President, to whom it was directly responsible, in which it recommended that negotiations be entered into "for the purpose of securing the sugar required for the necessities of the people of the United States for the year 1920."

On September 20, having had no response to this suggestion, the president of the board again wrote the President, informing him that "the time is fast approaching, if it has not arrived, when we will be unable to control the Cuban crop of sugar for the year 1919–20."

On September 23 the board received a letter from the Cuban representatives formally withdrawing their earlier offer. With that action disappeared the opportunity for the purchase of Cuban sugar at a material saving to American consumers. By that time nearly one-third of the future Cuban crop had been sold at prices ranging from 6.50 cents a pound upward, and Cuban producers, or at least a large proportion of them, sensing the world-wide demand for their product at rising prices, were unwilling to enter into a contract for the sale of their output at a fixed price, which they would have been willing to accept at an earlier date.

The question of responsibility for the lack of encouragement which the advances of the representatives of Cuba received is now merely of historic or academic interest, but it seems worth while, for the sake of accuracy, to point out that the Sugar Equalization Board went as far as its official position justified in directing attention to the matter, that American producers expressed their willingness to enter into a plan that obviously would have operated to hold down the price received for their product, and that the subject was not brought to the attention of Congress until a time when the purchase of the Cuban crop at a low price had become impossible.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentlemen on the Military Committee for yielding me time at this time. I heartily agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat in his closing request, when he asked permission to amend his remarks. I sincerely hope that he will take opportunity to amend them and get them somewhat in accord with the facts of the case.

I propose in the little time that I have to confine what I have to say to answering the unwarranted and unjust attacks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] upon the Louisiana sugar producers. One who listened to his remarks a few moments ago and who was not familiar with the conditions that exist in Louisiana might, perchance, come to the conclusion that the Louisiana producers have made an enormous profit in the sale of the sugar crop produced last year, and that to the making of this unwarranted and illegal profit the Attorney General of the United States was a party. What are the facts?

It is very easy to get up on the floor and to denounce people who are a thousand miles away from here, to produce facts and figures and apply them to a case when there is no foundation whatsoever for such an action. I venture the assertion that there is no class of producers in America who have contributed as much and as willingly and as uncomplainingly to the national welfare in the last two or three years as have the sugar producers of south Louisiana. To begin with, when the price was fixed by the Sugar Equalization Board for the crop year of 1918, it was fixed at 8.82 on plantation granulated—8.82 net to the farmer—granulated sugar, a sugar that goes directly into consumption, a sugar that you can not distinguish from the granulated sugar made by the American Sugar Co. Our people received $8.82 a hundred pounds for that kind of sugar.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Is that what the farmer himself got—$8.82 for a ton of cane sugar?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. That is what the factory got, and what the factory pays to the farmer is predicated upon what the factory gets for its sugar upon a sliding scale.

For instance, the average factory in my State pays to the farmer in dollars per ton for his cane an amount equal to the price for which the sugar sells for per pound in cents. For instance, if sugar sells for 10 cents a pound, then the man who raises the cane will get $10 a ton for his cane, and if sugar goes down next week to 9 cents a pound then the farmer who delivers the cane would get $9 a ton for his cane that week.

It is arranged on a sliding scale on weekly settlements.

Mr. BAER. It is just the reverse in my State. When the price of wheat goes down the price of flour goes up.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. That is not the way our factories buy from our farmers. At the time that the price of $8.82 was fixed, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, Louisiana had a good crop. In the summer of 1919 it was thought by us that it would have been a wise thing for the Government to have acquired the Cuban crop, the beet crop, and our crop, and the Louisiana people urged that before the Sugar Equalization Board, and we were met with the statement that it could not be done until and unless Congress gave that board additional authority to run beyond the 31st of December last.

But be that as it may, the year 1919 was the most disastrous year that the sugar people of Louisiana have ever had in the history of that industry. We made practically no crop at all, Mr. Chairman. Sugar factory after sugar factory in Louisiana never turned a wheel; sugar house after sugar house last winter never had a fire under a boiler.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will in a minute.

Mr. Chairman, the crops were consolidated and shipped to central factories at great distances. At the time the crop was to begin to come in a committee came here to Washington. How did they come? Did they come as beggars? No; because it was universally recognized, and had been so testified to before committees of this Congress, that without governmental regulation of some kind every pound of sugar that our planters made would sell for at least 25 cents a pound. They were asking for no favors from the Government. They were not asking for the price to be fixed. Every man in Louisiana knew what he could get for his sugar. They came here, nevertheless—I will call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to it—in an endeavor to hold down the price, not to put it up. Discussions were had with this and that governmental agency. There was no proposition ever made anywhere at any time by anybody to sell the Louisiana crop for 14 or 15 cents, as the gentleman has indicated—nowhere at any time. There was a tentative offer made at some such figure to the Louisiana people, which offer was politely declined.

Now, the Sugar Equalization Board did not acquire the Cuban crop. A price was fixed for the beet sugar of the West.

Now, what was the question before the Attorney General, who has been so severely arraigned here by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. What was the proposition that he had before him? Why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this committee, you could not have prosecuted a single sugar producer in Louisiana who sold his crop for 25 cents a pound. And why? It is not the price or what you get that determines whether or not you are a profiteer; it is what it costs you to produce that article. That is the question that determines whether or not you are a profiteer when you fix your price.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I refuse to yield.

The only question before the Government under the Lever bill and its amendments was whether or not the price charged was excessive; that is all. There could be no other question before it. Gentlemen in Louisiana, knowing not only the law but knowing what it had cost them to produce sugar, were justified in charging more for their sugar than the arrangement that they finally made with the United States attorney. What was this arrangement? The gentleman from Massachusetts said the district attorney down there, Mr. Mooney, consulted only the sugar producers. If the gentleman will turn to Mr. Mooney's telegram to the Attorney General, he will find this in the body of the telegram:

My session with the planters was a protracted one, and was held after I had talked to many of the leading consumers and obtained their views.

Men in Louisiana knew what it had cost to produce sugar. The consumer was consulted as well as the producer, and when the gentleman from Massachusetts stated that Mr. Mooney had consulted none but the producer, he had that telegram in his hand, and he knew that Mr. Mooney, the United States district attorney, had consulted not only the producers but had consulted the leading consumers in the community.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this committee, what price was agreed on? Did the planters, all of them, rush to an agreement of 17 cents for their yellow clarified sugar, which is an edible sugar, and 18 cents for their granulated, which can not be told from trust granulated? No, sir. A number of the sugar producers, and producers of cane also, thought that with the extreme shortage in the crop, and the tremendous cost of making the crop, that they were entitled to receive more than 17 and 18 cents. And yet, after protracted meetings and protracted discussions, an agreement was had with Mr. Mooney that 17 cents for yellow clarified and 18 cents for plantation granulated was not an unreasonable price. Let us see. Nine cents was agreed on as the price—9 cents less 2 per cent—which came to 8.82 for the crop of 1918. That crop was produced cheaper than the 1919 crop.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. QUIN. I am sorry, but I have not the time. I had to take five minutes from another gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I regret——

Mr. QUIN. I yield two more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I thank the gentleman.

The 1919 price, had it been fixed fairly, would have been three times the price of the 1918 crop, because the crop was two-thirds short. In other words, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, with the same acreage and at greater expense, the climatic conditions were such in Louisiana that the crop was ruined, and only about a third of a crop was harvested, and it cost more than the previous full crop had cost, yet the farmer received only twice the price, when, as a matter of fairness and justice, he could have demanded and legally received at least three times the price that he had received for his 1918 crop.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the honorable gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. If I have the time.

Mr. TINKHAM. I desire to bring his attention to a statement on page 2 of Public Document No. 644, the response of the Attorney General relative to fixing the price on sugar.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I have read it, sir.

Mr. TINKHAM. He says:

I have before me your telegram of the——

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I decline to yield to a reading.

Mr. TINKHAM. I understood, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman would yield for a question.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I decline to yield to the reading of a document.

Mr. TINKHAM. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he had read that statement?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes; I have read it.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman yielded back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed his time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] use some of his time.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I will consume some of this time myself and discuss the matter that is presumed to be before the House, and that is the Military Academy bill for the maintenance of our institution at West Point, where we educate the officers for the Army of the United States.

I deeply appreciate what my colleague from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] has said in response to the outbreak here of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. The reason why I yielded time that I had under my control to the gentleman from Louisiana was to enable him to correct the erroneous statements and false impressions and conclusions that might otherwise be left in the minds of Members by such a speech as that made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, we have heard within the last four years much talk about the military program of preparedness. I have the honor of being a member of the subcommittee that considered and formulated the bill for the support of the Military Academy at West Point. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] is chairman of that subcommittee. He has given careful and thoughtful consideration to the bill, and I believe he knows more about this bill than any of us on the committee because of his hard study of that measure. He will discuss it later on.

We asked here more money than the whole committee has given. The bill which the committee brings out carries in round numbers $2,142,000. Last year the bill carried $122,223 more than this bill calls for. Gentlemen, in my judgment, every single item of this bill should be passed by this Congress. I appreciate the fact that we should all use the pruning knife on appropriations and cut out useless appropriations wherever possible, but there is such a thing as being parsimonious and using and exercising in legislation unwise economy.

You will note that there are throughout this country such organizations as the National Security League and other kindred organizations which endeavor to foster militarism. They are endeavoring to set a great military hen with more eggs than she can cover; and, in my judgment, the Democratic caucus a few nights ago struck the best blow that has been delivered since 1916 against that crowd. [Applause.]

I do not say and I do not believe that everyone who advocates a great standing army and advocates all of this preparedness program of having compulsory military training all over this country in time of peace does it through any selfish motives. There are many men who really in earnest believe that ought to be done. But the big interests of this country, the militarists, are taking advantage of the unsettled conditions and are taking advantage of the idea that some people have that it might be a good thing to force the American Congress to adopt such a program.

My idea is that the Military Academy at West Point is the proper place to educate our officers in a scientific manner, to give them a broad, fundamental education; and the splendid military education which this academy gives is recognized by experts abroad, and the institution is regarded as the finest institution of its kind in the world. In order for us to have our country properly prepared, we must have such officers in abundant number as such an institution will turn out. In order to have our people made safe and let those who have their misgivings and are a little subject to hysteria have a full understanding that we will have trained military officers, I am in favor of that institution being encouraged and built up in every possible way, and I am in favor of having the program of training and education there such at all times as to keep and maintain the best of military education in the world here in our own country. [Applause.] In order to do that, certain policies must be carried on. The improvements that have been started up there, which the program sets out that must be continued, in my judgment should be authorized and appropriated for by this Congress.

Not all of the money has been properly spent there; but, gentlemen, you have a quartermaster there now in the person of Col. Timberlake who is a fine business man, who uses the public funds just as a good, economical business man in private life would do. He does not waste, in my judgment, a dollar of the funds that we allow him. He is a man who uses the best judgment and the most economical and discriminating method of expending the public funds intrusted to him of any public officer I know, especially in the whole Military Establishment. For that reason I believe this House should grant the money that is asked for. It will be wisely and economically expended under Col. Timberlake's management.

One other thing: The course at West Point has been cut since the war started. The law leaves it discretionary with the President of the United States as to what the curriculum shall be—whether one year, two years, three years, four years, and so on. The head of the General Staff, Gen. March, has seen proper to cut that course down. They have it now at three years. It has been two years, I believe. This committee has brought out a provision in this bill asking this Congress to make it a matter of law that the course shall be four years at West Point. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, there is a reason for it being four years. All of the training and education that is necessary can not be given in three years' time, and it is the policy now under the short term up there to have the boys so well educated in a college or university before they go there that they can go on with ease in a three-year term. But if that is done it cuts out the poor boy; it cuts out the high-school boy; it cuts out the farmer's boy throughout this country. So we must have this course four years. Under that plan and that method they have jerked the coats off 100 of these boys in the last examination and sent them back home because they could not pass that examination.

You can see why it is necessary to have the course four years if we propose to take care of the plain, common, poor boys throughout the United States. Every gentleman here ought to be willing to do that. But let me give you the figures on it. In the last 50 years, under the four-year course, one-fifth of the entire student body at our National Military Academy at West Point have come from the farms, and we all have reason to be proud of the records that those boys have made. I would like to see a great many more of them come from the farms. I believe we ought to have about 90 per cent of them from the farms and workshops and middle class, because when they become officers to command the armies of the United States they will have the real spirit of America and they will know the feelings of the private soldier, and they will know what he stands for.

So, my friends, I ask you to stand up with the committee on that provision to have a four-year course made a matter of law, so that no Chief of the General Staff in the future can cut it down and put these restrictions around it that will keep the poor boy from going to the academy.

And let me say to you, by way of suggestion, that Gen. Pershing stands with our committee on that proposition; and in response to Mr. MORIN'S question as to his position he sent a telegram giving as his reasons for believing in the four-year course part of the reasons that I have given you why it should be four years instead of three years. None of them believes it ought to be two years. Some of the officers did not openly express themselves in favor of the four-year period, because perhaps their jobs might depend on the position they take. They can not go counter to the big chief. You know how that is. But fundamentally, in my judgment, 99 per cent of the Army officers believe that a boy ought to go to West Point for four years; and certainly almost every civilian who has his heart beating in accord with the feelings of the masses of the people must believe that we should have the four-year period in order that the son of the plain, honest workingman and farmer throughout the United States can go to the academy and take that course if his Congressman sees fit to appoint him.

Further, there has been suggested a change in the method of appointing these boys. Some of them wanted a program whereby they could just go out and select them from anywhere in the United States, if the cadet whom you have nominated and his alternate fail. Your committee does not believe in that. They believe that Representatives and Senators should have the right to name the boys to go to West Point, and that policy has been adhered to by our committee and we have incorporated it here into this bill. If we are going to keep down the hue and cry for compulsory military service in the United States, we must have the Military Academy at West Point a strong institution, where the great body of the American people will know that at all times we have a strong force of men trained in the science and art of military affairs.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Does not Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, oppose the four-year course and recommend the three-year course?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, yes; he does; but is that any reason why this Congress should adopt the three-year course, because Gen. March advocates it? Is that any reason why this Congress should vote against a four-year course, because Gen. March opposes it? I say that is no reason. I have great respect for Gen. March, but I do not agree with him on that proposition. I have never believed it was good for the institution to shorten the course. I did not believe in it when he cut it down during the war. If I had had my way about it, it would not have been cut down a single day. We can not afford to have the Military Academy at West Point trimmed down to where it is nothing but a two-year or a three-year course, and I believe that the people who want to foster compulsory military training in this country would like to see that very thing done as an excuse why we should have universal compulsory military training and service in time of peace. In order that the American people may know that they will have splendid officers and plenty of them, West Point should have a four year's course and the enlargement of the number of cadets that the bill which the committee has brought out calls for. Personally every man on the floor knows that I am against compulsory military service and compulsory military training in time of peace. You know my opinion on that subject. I could not express my contempt for that idea; it would bankrupt the English language for me to attempt to describe what compulsory military service means in time of peace. [Laughter.] All of us in our districts and elsewhere during the war, and even the President of the United States said so; every public orator said we are now fighting to suppress autocracy and militarism, the very system that Germany had that I believe brought on this great holocaust across the sea where millions of lives were lost and millions of treasure were destroyed, causing heartburns throughout the country, newly made graves, and sorrow all over the world. It was that horrible system of military training and militarism that brought on the war. And yet there are some people trying in this country the same thing, making a lie when we told the country that there would be no militarism in this country. We fought to suppress the Prussian system of militarism, and yet we have it advocated here at our own doors.

We have certain organizations with a propaganda that they are trying to put forth, and they even had a fellow supposed to be a colonel who distributed circulars containing that propaganda around the land. That had no terrors for me, because I represent the people, and I feel what I know is for their interest.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to know if the gentleman from Mississippi is not advised that the leader of his party advocates military training, which, according to the gentleman's own statement, he was fighting two years ago.

Mr. QUIN. In answer I will say that I am not discussing the President of the United States. He has been ill a good long while, and I do not think it pertinent to this discussion to consider what the President said. I will say this in response to the gentleman: The Democratic caucus, composed of Democrats from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Canadian line to the Gulf of Mexico, said in this very Chamber, and you saw it published in the papers, the fact that they voted 108 against the training to 17 for it. I believe that on the gentleman's own side of the House there is a majority against that program. I certainly can not believe that the Republican Party in the United States would join hands with a great organization of capital, with the Steel Trust, with the Security League, and with those great classes of millionaires and billionaires in endeavoring to fasten this horrible, contemptible thing on the people of the United States.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman further yield? The implication of that is that the President joined hands with those people.

Mr. QUIN. I do not know what the President stands for. He has been ill a good while and I have not had an opportunity to confer with him. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Whatever view the President has he is honest in it. He does not stand with the big interests to oppress the people. I am telling you what I stand for, and what the Democratic Party stands for. All of this crowd desiring to keep the laboring man of the United States out and down in fear, all of this crowd who knows that Congress can pass the income tax and the excess-profit tax to catch them, and that they as taxpayers intend to try to pass it on to the poor fellow who has to get down with the grub hoe and plow and spade, with the saw and plane and the hammer—all of that crowd of big "buck-passers" are crying for compulsory military training.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUIN. Yes; I have been on that committee ever since you put me there in 1913.

Mr. KITCHIN. You have had the compulsory training proposition before you for six or seven months. When are you going to bring it out and give us a chance to vote on it?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, we will never bring it out. Why, some of us on that committee have been fighting that thing ever since its inception; we are fighting it yet. We are going to keep fighting it. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that we have been tied on that thing; three lonesome Democrats rambled off with a lot of Republicans under the leadership of my able and genial friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. MASON. Since the gentleman has not been able to confer with the President of the United States, has he asked you to resign on that account?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, the President does not appoint me. The good people of the seventh district of Mississippi place me here. I am going to stick to them. These good farmers and merchants and bankers and laboring folks that believe in the integrity of the Government, people who stand ready to go out and defend the flag at any time, people who pay the taxes for all legitimate purposes, but who would call a halt on paying taxes of a billion three hundred million dollars every year to have their own sons jacked up by the nape of the neck and pitched by the seat of the pants into the Army of the United States under the euphonious name of universal military training, will object. [Laughter.]

Here is what you are doing: You are proposing to take these very men who ultimately pay all of these great taxes, $36,000,000,000, hanging on the shoulders of the people of this country from the war, fighting to suppress militarism, to crush out the system where for 40 or 50 years Germany trained its boys in the very same manner that is proposed to be trained here under the bill before our committee, and which passed out of committee onto the Senate floor the other day.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. If it is not giving away any secrets of the Military Affairs Committee, I would like to know if the majority of the Democrats or a majority of the Republicans on that committee believe in this compulsory military training. How do they stand on that committee as between Democrats and Republicans?

Mr. QUIN. Well, you know we have but eight men on the Democratic side on the committee, and five of us, headed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], are against it, and have been fighting it, and I will say this: There are five Republicans on that committee who stand with us Democrats for the people, who represent the masses, who represent the plain people, and those five gentlemen have joined in with me and with Mr. DENT and Mr. FIELDS and with Mr. HARRISON and Mr. WISE, who constitute the five Democratic members of that committee, who oppose universal compulsory military training or service in time of peace. We have been able by having this tie to prevent that monstrosity from being dragged out on the floor of this House.

Mr. CARTER. How many Republicans have?

Mr. QUIN. Some of my Democratic friends have said, "Why do you not let it get out here on the floor, so that we can vote on it and show how we stand on the subject?" But, Mr. Chairman, I never believe in turning a lion loose in my house. [Laughter.] Whenever I see a snake I kill him. You never saw a farmer who would let a great, big rattlesnake crawl up the yard over his doorsill into his house so he could bite his wife and children, and so your committee would not let this horrible snake of militarism be brought out from the committee and turned loose in this House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman mean to say there are seven Republicans on the committee who are against it? How many are for it?

Mr. QUIN. Well, the gentleman knows the personnel of the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I do not. How many of the committee are with the chairman?

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman knows there are not seven. There are five Republicans. There are only five Democrats and five Republicans against universal compulsory military training on that committee. You know there is a vacancy. We have only 20 members at this time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know, but I have seen something in the newspapers and would not know how true it is because I have not kept track of it strictly, but has the Senate committee reported out any compulsory military training bill?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, yes; they have it out over there. They have let the snake loose on the floor of the Senate, and that is the reason that our caucus was called here the other evening, in my judgment. They saw there was some danger of that snake getting out of our own committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I would rather not. I would rather pursue my discussion.

Mr. CARTER. But the gentleman has not yet straightened out the committee matter and told how they stand. The gentleman is a Democrat, is he not?

Mr. QUIN. I have told you how we stand.

Mr. CARTER. Let me ask the gentlemen this question.

Mr. QUIN. Five Democrats are all right on it, and five Republicans are all right on it; they are against this great monstrosity of compulsory military service in time of peace. There has been no vote in the committee. I am just telling you that is my impression from what they say to me.

Mr. CARTER. How do the Republicans stand on the committee? How many are for military training and how many are against it?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, there are not enough to get it out here, or they would have had it out.

Mr. CARTER. How many Republicans are for military training on the committee?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman from Mississippi understands that one of the practices here is not to talk about what occurs in the committee, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] knows that, too, as the former leader on the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. QUIN. Oh, I will ask gentlemen not to take up my time. All I ask is for a majority of the Republicans to stand like a majority of the Democrats and we will not have any compulsory military training in this country. When the next election comes around, if the people want it, then let a majority of the people vote for it. If a majority of the people believe we ought to tax the people any more than we have been taxing them to build up a great military system in this country, let them show it at the polls; let every man in this House say how he stands. I am willing to go before my people and let them know that I am against that monstrosity, however any man may feel in my district upon that or any other subject. I propose to go out boldly and fearlessly and let the people know how I stand. To me it is immaterial how anybody else stands. In my judgment the worst thing that can be done, the worst blow that could be aimed at patriotism and the liberties of the American people, would be to fasten upon the Republic universal compulsory military service. I do not believe that any more dangerous thing could be done than to put on this Republic compulsory military training, because that means compulsory military service in time of peace. Some of the bills that have been introduced are for putting into the reserve army 750,000 of these young men after they have been grabbed from their homes; to take them away from the bedside of the sick mother; to take them from the farms, where we need them; to take them out of the workshops; to take those boys out that are needed at home and put them into military camps under this great system of court-martial, where trained tyrannical Army officers can court-martial them and send them to the penitentiary for smoking a cigarette, or taking it away from him—all of that kind of nonsense. The people of our country do not believe in that kind of thing, and I do not believe they would put any party back in power that would pass such a law.

We have done enough to the American people in winning this war. We have taxed the life out of them; we took their boys away from them; we deprived them of free speech. The Congress and the Executive of this Republic would not let them publish articles. We have done everything to them. We had a governmental agency that would not let you put sugar and flour on your table. It was right to pass all such laws to win the war. Right down in the country, where we have cribs full of corn, they had to buy half wheat flour and half corn meal. All these things have soured on the stomachs of the people. And I want to ask you now, when you come right on the heels of it all and say, "We are going to grab your boys up, between the ages of 18 and 21, and carry them to a military camp and give them military training and make soldiers out of them from now on until doomsday," what are the people going to say? They will say, "Has our Republic gone? Has the old Republic of Washington and Jefferson passed away? Are we following in the tracks of the Kaiser? Are we following that horrible system that has brought on Europe that great and awful holocaust that cost so much blood and treasure; that afterwards engulfed the fair Republic of America, wherein 150,000 of our own boys lost their lives; and where, from the efforts that we are making for the rehabilitation of the crippled ones, there must have been a world of them crippled?" That is what the people are thinking about, and they are going to look to Congress on that. If a majority of the Republicans stand as I believe they do, it will not be the law. I know the Democrats are against it, and I am confident a majority of the Republicans are against it.

Mr. OGDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time. I am confident, my friends, that the American people, at least for years, will be safe from any such German-Prussianism as that. And if they understand it, when they go to vote next fall there will be some left at home that are trying to fasten it on the people to-day. We talk about free speech and all that. I know this Republic is passing through a time of critical events. Events have changed many things within the last two or three years. All good Americans should be on guard to protect the rights and the liberties of the great masses of the American people.

You have in this country, my friends, two classes that are really dangerous. One of them is that bolshevistic press that advises force and the tearing down of our institutions, and the other is the billionaire press of that great capitalistic class that would impose on the people. You must not think it is all with the poor devils of Bolshevism. These fellows on the soap boxes, and that we call Bolshevists, have not any influence except what devilment they can stir up. We have got to keep that down, and the Government is going to do it and ought to do it; but at the same time this Government should, through the representatives of the people, keep down the invisible and dangerous power of the capitalistic class, which sinister power for selfish purposes stands as a greater menace to the perpetuity of the Republic than do the Bolshevists. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I thank you.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the year 1920 will witness many changes in politics. In the first place college presidents will not be as popular this year as they were in 1912 and in 1916, for the most prominently mentioned candidates for president upon the Republican and Democratic tickets are newspaper men. Senator WARREN G. HARDING [applause] is one of the most prominently mentioned names for the Republican choice for President, and Gov. James M. Cox [applause] is one of the most prominently mentioned candidates for President on the Democratic ticket. Both are native sons of Ohio, both are newspaper men, and not only edit the papers but in fact own them, and a man who can run a newspaper successfully is certainly a good business man. Senator HARDING was elected to the United States Senate in 1914 by an unprecedented majority, and Gov. Cox has three times been elected governor of Ohio. Geography will cut a great figure this year, and naturally all eyes are turned upon Ohio as the pivotal State in 1920. Indiana used to claim that honor, but it is now Ohio. Ohio and Virginia have vied with each other in having the honor of being the "Mother of Presidents," each having furnished five, but I fear in 1920 Ohio will leave Virginia behind and take the honor to herself. Anyway, the year 1920 will witness the entrance of newspaper men as the controlling factor in American politics and exit college presidents. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] was to have had five minutes to address the committee. He was unavoidably called to his office, but he left with me a letter, or a copy of a letter, which he desired to have read and inserted in the RECORD, and I ask that that be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the letter of the gentleman from Michigan be read.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what is the letter about?

Mr. KAHN. About two young men who captured the first German prisoner and who came from Mr. JAMES's district. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 12, 1920.

Hon. W. FRANK JAMES,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. JAMES: Referring to your letter of February 2 relative to the desire of American Legion Post No. 5, Ironwood, Mich., to obtain official proof from the War Department that Adam Blazokowski and John Kohanski, of Ironwood, Mich., captured the first German prisoner for the American Army in the World War, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

On the night of October 27–28, 1917, Pvts. Adam Blazokowski and John Kohanski, both of Company C, Eighteenth Infantry, wounded and captured Pvt. Leonhard Hoffman, the first German prisoner captured in the World War by the American Army. This prisoner was captured about 400 meters northwest of Bures in the Province of Meurthe et Moselle.

The prisoner belonged to the Third Heavy Machine Gun Company of the Seventh Regiment of the First Landwehr Division of the Third Bavarian Army Corps. He was the company mail carrier and was on his way back to his company after having gotten the mail when he was captured.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in December, 1862, Lincoln referred to the subject of emancipation as follows: "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty and we must rise to the occasion."

This statement is as applicable to the situation to-day as it was 58 years ago. With perfect candor must we admit that the present occasion is piled high with difficulty, but as real Americans we are looking forward, burying the dead past, and making to-day's accomplishments pave the way to to-morrow's success.

The people of this country are looking forward to the reestablishment of a government at Washington that realizes that the Constitution of the United States is still functioning and that the title of President has not been changed to king. They are looking forward to the day when a Republican President, supported by a Republican House and Senate, shall be once more working in harmonious effort to develop by wise legislation that feeling of security in industrial and economic problems that has always existed under Republican rule. Explain the causes as you will, the fact remains that under every Democratic administration we have had industrial and economic disaster, and hardship and financial loss have been the portion of the great army of wage earners in this land as a result of these conditions.

We were heading directly for this zone of disaster in 1913 and 1914, when the misery and necessity of European belligerents was as welcome as the manna in the desert to the Democratic Party, just on the verge of another collapse. Then came to us a period of prosperity, and Democratic spellbinders rushed forth to explain to the people that their party was no longer a failure; that even with their low-tariff bill wages were higher than ever before and labor in such demand that its opportunities for added remuneration were countless. Yes; it was a period of prosperity, but of poisonous prosperity, for so intent were we in the pursuit of the almighty dollar, selling ammunition and clothes and food to Europe, while there men, young and old, were fighting the mighty forces of Germany, that we well-nigh forgot our duty in the matter.

Under the soporific influence of the Democratic leaders' unctious phrases we were gently rocked to the tune of "neutrality" and very nearly fell sound asleep as Woodrow crooned "I'll keep you out of war."

And it shall be written on history's pages that the final awakening to a realization of duty, to the fact that there were still in our American manhood and womanhood traditional loyalty and an inherent nobility of character, was not at the behest of the Democratic Executive, but at the clarion call of a man who for months had been forced to stand alone, the man who finally stirred the conscience and fighting spirit of America—Theodore Roosevelt.

The war is over, thank Heaven, and we all devoutly pray that the war god may be stripped of his armor and his sword and shield beaten into plowshares.

If it can be banished by the adoption of the League of Nations, then let us accept it; but let the President and his senatorial satellites meet us at least halfway in order that such reservations may be adopted as will assure the people of the United States that the necessity of sending our beloved boys to war shall not be determined by the European members of the league but by our own Congress. If ever again there appears to be necessity for our intervention in the cause of right and justice, rest assured that American soldiers will never shirk their duty.

But new problems face the country, and the Republican Party must convince the people of this Nation that they are determined to cope with them, not in the interest of any class, but that labor shall have a square deal, capital a square deal, and that the long-suffering public shall not be lost in the shuffle.

Labor and capital will find their differences disappearing if there can gradually be developed a satisfactory partnership. There was a time when capital held the whip hand in this country and labor was at a distinct disadvantage, when class legislation was not a rarity and labor was looked upon as a mere commodity. But conditions have changed; the power of capital has been circumscribed; class distinctions have been leveled, and the rights of labor have come into general recognition. A more even and just balance between capital and labor has been established and the dawn of a new era is at hand. But class domination, with labor in the ascendancy, is just as obnoxious to the American people as with capital in control. They will not tolerate it, and any attempt to fasten it upon the Government through the ballot or any other medium will be resented.

The labor vote of America is intelligent, patriotic, and considerate; it is not for sale, barter, or gift; no politician carries it around in his vest pocket and no boss can drive it into the runway of his particular desires. It is composed of enlightened and educated American citizens, entirely competent to think and reason for themselves, and they will do so in this coming campaign.

Workingmen constitute the great majority of the electorate in this country, and they realize that their interests are identical with the interests of the Nation and that they prosper only when the United States is prosperous. As a Republican I take this opportunity of stating that I stand for the principle of collective bargaining, believing it to be fundamentally sound and a very efficient method of preventing disastrous strikes.

High wages are here to stay, and the Republican Party is desirous of maintaining the best possible standard of living conditions for our wage earners. It is high time that our people were assured of something more than the oft-quoted "living wage." If all they have to look forward to during long years of toil is a bare living wage, then the future holds little of comfort or consolation for them, and in the living present makes life a constant struggle with debt. Labor is sound, is loyal, and deserving. Let us keep the standard high.

We have taken a long step forward toward eliminating wasteful expenditure of national funds by the adoption of a measure providing for a budget system. This will tend to put the Government on a business basis and will enable the people to fix responsibility for extravagance and for excessive taxation.

The railroads are to be returned to their owners on March 1, and we must be quite certain that the legislation enacted for their conduct and control is fair to invested capital, fair to the employees, and that no unnecessary burden is placed on the shoulders of the general public, who, of course, must eventually pay the bill. Let us not lose sight of the fact that our savings banks and our great life insurance companies are all heavy stockholders in railroad securities. There is no question but that to meet the unusual raise in wages and upkeep the Railroad Administration should have made a further raise in rates, but this has been avoided for purely political purposes. Knowing that the railroads were to be returned to private control, the Democrats have decided it would be a vote-catching proposition to let the raise in rates come after the railroad bill was passed by a Republican Congress and then shout "We told you so."

But they will not lead many common-sense Americans into the Democratic donkey stable with that kind of chaff. I desire in this connection to refer to a statement of Walker D. Hines made before the Bar Association of the City of New York, in which he said, "The real reason for the deficit is due to the fact that the prices charged for railroad transportation have not been increased in keeping with the increase in prices of commodities."

If, as I have been informed, the present Federal child-labor law has been declared unconstitutional, it is high time that we enacted legislation on this subject that will stand the test of our highest tribunal. While many States have splendid laws on this subject, it is really a subject of national importance.

In the very near future foreign competition must be reckoned with and the present tariff must undergo a thorough revision. The standard of American wages and consequent living conditions are higher than ever before in our history, and they must be maintained. Japan and Germany are preparing to flood our markets with the handiwork of their artisans, who are working long hours and for ridiculously low wages. England also will strain every nerve to have the trade balance show in her favor. The World War built a tariff wall around the United States as high as that encompassing China, but that protection has crumbled away with the ending of the war, and a good old-fashioned, revenue-producing Republican tariff is what we are going to need.

There is a wide divergence of opinion all over the country as to what should be our military and naval policies. When we finally entered the war and realized the deplorable condition of unpreparedness there was a strong, well-defined expression by thoughtful Americans that in the future we should adopt some method of universal training. After 20 months' participation in the bloodiest of all wars, where it was our privilege to take an active part on several fronts and in so decisive a manner as to bring the war to a close, we find that a reaction has set in and an evident propaganda is being instituted against any form of military training. This is a problem the consideration of which searches the heart of every mother and father in the land. Of course, we all hope and pray that never more shall nation against nation rise, but the joy of the millennium is not yet, even though we have a League of Nations.

We live in the greatest country under the canopy of the universe. America spells opportunity for our children in the days to come and opens wide the avenues for accomplishment to those of us who are ready to act in the living present. Then, fathers and mothers of America, what is to be the answer; we are your Representatives; your flesh and blood must render the service. American Legion, what have you to say? You gave such service as has never been equaled in the world's history, considering your short period of training. You had many hardships and much suffering to endure even in our own camps before you went to the fighting line. Unpreparedness cost us thousands of lives. What is your message to Congress on this subject? Shall we keep America strong and great or shall we some day be again caught in the trap of unpreparedness, baited with the cheese of pacifism?

The development of a merchant marine that shall carry the Stars and Stripes to the ports of the world is the ambition of this Congress. And here again enters the discussion as to private or Government ownership. The great preponderance of opinion seems to be in favor of the return of the ships to private owners, and the Shipping Board, although they have had wonderful success under the allocation system, are now selling the ships with a view to reduce to a minimum any loss to the Government. A degree of loss is inevitable; many loyal citizens, experts in shipping, who practically donated their services to the Shipping Board, are of the opinion that the ships should be sold at a sufficiently low price to represent the difference between the normal cost and the excessive war cost of forced production. This might fairly be considered a legitimate proposition that could without prejudice or discussion be considered a war loss. The necessity of a powerful Navy is accentuated by the development of a merchant marine. I believe we should have a Navy the equal of any afloat, for a first-class navy with an auxiliary service of hydroplanes would perhaps give us our greatest security against coast attack.

These are a few of the many intricate problems that are before us for the year 1920. Let us face them with courage and determination. The Nation believes in the Republican Party; its record abounds in constructive accomplishment. The Nation looks with hope for wise guidance and sane progress; the Nation expects a broad and humanitarian treatment of the problem of human rights and human welfare. It demands the emancipation of business, the removal of vexatious restrictions and obnoxious taxes. It demands security under the law for life and property and the protection of an American citizen wherever he may be, and demands the vigilant safeguarding of our national liberty and sovereignty. To these duties the Republican Congress dedicates itself.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. How much has the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARD. How long does the gentleman intend to have the committee sit? It is now nearly 5 o'clock Saturday night.

Mr. KAHN. I hope to finish in 18 minutes. I propose to move to rise as soon as we finish the general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, there is no obligation of the people of the United States, whether it be written in the laws or simply be of record in the hearts of our people, greater than that which the Nation owes to its soldiers and sailors who have served it in war. So long as our people frankly recognize such obligations and do their utmost to meet them in letter and spirit, so long will our great Republic be sound at the core and capable of throwing off the insidious agencies of disintegration and decay which constantly seek to attach themselves to the body politic. It is to the credit of our Nation that it has been good to its surviving soldiers of all its wars, from the Revolution to the present day. The soldiers of the Revolution and their widows were pensioned in the early part of the last century upon a basis that was generous for that period, when money was less abundant and had a greater purchasing power than it has to-day. Although the Revolutionary War extended over eight years, the single terms of service of soldiers were generally brief, where they were called out for particular campaigns, and in a few months, the campaign being over, they were discharged and returned home. Often, however, the Revolutionary soldiers had several of these short terms of service of two or three or six months' duration, as they were called out for special emergencies. Pensions were also granted to all widows of Revolutionary soldiers.

Again, following the War of 1812, the veterans were given grants of public land in the form of certificates, which they were at liberty to apply to the land itself or to sell for cash.

Following the Mexican War, pensions were granted to soldiers suffering from disability incurred in or as a result of their military service and to widows of Mexican War veterans.

The casualties of the Civil War were far greater than those of all former wars combined. A general pension bill was passed during or shortly subsequent to the war, graded according to the nature of the casualty incurred and confined to those cases where the disability was incurred in or as a direct result of military service and in the line of duty.

It was not until more than a quarter of a century after the Civil War that service pensions were enacted, to take effect at the date when the veteran should have reached the age of 62 years. As with the passing of time the veterans reached more advanced age their pensions were increased, until now, under the Sherwood Act, the lowest pension paid is at the rate of $30 per month. To entitle a soldier to a pension he must have an honorable discharge and have served not less than 90 days. To soldiers of the Revolutionary War the pension limit was 14 days. At this date the average age of Civil War pensioners is 75 years, and the House has passed what is known as the Fuller pension bill, which advances the pension to all Civil War veterans who served not less than 90 days and who were honorably discharged to $50 per month. The bill is now under consideration in the Senate.

This enlightened and generous policy toward the soldiers of our various wars has stood us in good stead when serious crises have arisen in our national affairs and the call has gone forth for men to defend national interests and policies with their lives. The men who go do not think much about these things. They go because their country needs them. They offer their lives to the service, and if they think of compensation at all it is with the vague idea that the Nation is going to do the fair thing by them, and if they do not return their dependents will be taken care of. They know in a general way that the country has been fairly liberal with the soldiers of its various wars, and that that is likely to continue to be its policy.

Now, we come down to the great World War. In round numbers, 4,000,000 men went out. Over 2,000,000 went overseas. They were all prepared to go when they should receive their orders. These men received no bounties of any sort, if the $60 bonus at discharge be excepted. I believe that it is the general sentiment of the country that some substantial recognition should be made to every soldier and sailor who served during the war.

Many proposed enactments have been presented to Congress, intended to carry out this idea and to meet this generally recognized national obligation of honor. One of these is the Mondell soldiers' land settlement bill, which to my mind has many most admirable features. Its advantages, however, would naturally be confined to those soldiers who might desire to enter upon an agricultural life. Representative MORGAN and others have introduced bills to provide for a substantial bonus payment in cash.

One of the great difficulties of the situation is patent to every fair and thoughtful mind, and that is the large amount of money involved and the difficulty of raising it in addition to the other billions necessary to the carrying on of the Government and the discharge of the obligations incident to the winding up of the war. We now have an annual interest account on Liberty bonds alone equal to the entire expense of the Government before the war. There is no way of raising the necessary amount of money involved except by the issue of bonds. That is a step that all prudent men of all parties hesitate to take. We strained ourselves to the limit in the drives for the various Liberty loans during the war, and to undertake such a drive now, without the stimulus that the necessities of war involved, would be a most serious if not doubtful undertaking.

It is an axiom, however, applicable to nations as to individuals, that if we owe anyone, either in honor or in bond, which presently we are unable to pay, we should at least make our best endeavor to do so. If circumstances make it impossible to pay cash we should be willing to offer our note to pay at some time in the future.

It is with this principle in mind that I have ventured to introduce into the House of Representatives a bill (H. R. 12347), in the hope that it may suggest to Members a method by which this obligation to our soldiers as nearly as possible may be met without a violent strain upon our national credit. Fairly it may be described as a payment by note instead of cash.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. OSBORNE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I am greatly interested in what the gentleman is saying, and I have been interested in all those proposals; but one of the things that concerns me more than anything else is the question, if we take the step of issuing a bond or note which the receiver will want to convert into money, what would be the effect on the market value of Government securities if a large amount of the bonds or notes were thrown on the market at once to be cashed? Our Liberty bonds have gone down to 90 per cent now. What general effect would it have, in the gentleman's opinion, upon the expansion of our credit and the reduction of the value of Government securities?

Mr. OSBORNE. I would say that that is a serious question to be taken into account in considering such a measure as I am about to read. The bill follows:

A bill (H. R. 12347) to authorize an additional issue of bonds, to be known as World War veteran bonds, to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and to preserve the national honor; such bonds to be issued to soldiers, sailors, and marines—officers and men alike—at the rate of $1 per day for each day served during the war; to provide the manner in which such bonds shall be issued, and for other purposes.

Whereas there is a very general sentiment throughout the country in favor of a more material recognition of the valuable and patriotic services of the brave men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the World War than has been given, in the form of a bonus, that will assist in returning these soldiers and sailors to the advantages in life that they enjoyed when they entered the war service of their country; and

Whereas the financial situation of the country resulting from the war, involving unprecedented Federal taxes, renders it difficult to meet in cash the recognized moral obligation of the country to its veterans of the World War; and

Whereas the manifest difficulties of the situation do not absolve the Nation from the obligation, but do justify the best efforts of Congress and the Government to meet the obligations of honor of the Nation by such methods as are available: Therefore

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That every soldier, sailor, and marine who served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the period of the World War, commencing April 6, 1917, and ending June 30, 1919, and who has received an honorable discharge, or who at the date of the passage of this act still remains in the military, naval, or marine service of the United States, is entitled to and shall receive a World War veteran bond in the manner hereafter provided to the amount of $1 for each day served within the period named.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue World War veteran bonds, one for each soldier, sailor, and marine who served during the period stated—officers and men alike—in the amount of $1 for each day of service, such bonds to be issued under rules and regulations to be formulated jointly by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 3. That such World War veteran bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, payable principal and interest in gold coin of the United States, and at such times as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. That such issue of bonds shall be limited in total amount to $1,500,000,000.

SEC. 4. That this act shall go into effect on and after its passage, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

This bill has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and I am assured that it will have careful consideration.

While I am not unmindful of the fact that this bill or any bill that seeks to do anything in the way of performing this act of justice to our soldiers will add that much to our national debt and a certain amount to our annual interest account, it will, however, obviate the necessity of another and doubtful big bond drive. Personally I believe that, as the importance of withholding the bonds from flooding the market is explained to and understood by the World's War veterans, the bonds would be held by the original owners in something like the same proportion that Liberty bonds were held by the original purchasers. They comprise an excellent collateral for loans, and those who might need money for temporary purposes might so employ them and obviate the necessity of throwing them on the market. I have confidence that this proposed issue of World's War veteran bonds would not be greatly sacrificed on the market, and that their issue would not cause a serious decline in the market value of Liberty bonds. And I have confidence that, as in the case of many another debtor, the time that this method will give us will assist, in the long run, in enabling America to emerge with success financially, with its honorable obligations to its brave defenders fully vindicated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Mississippi kindly use some time?

Mr. QUIN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for one minute.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, since the announcement of candidates for President seems to be in order, I want to announce that Oklahoma will present for President of the United States Senator ROBERT L. OWEN, of that State.

I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD a speech made in connection with that matter by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] at the convention a short time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein the speech made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the speech referred to:

SPEECH OF HON. W. W. HASTINGS, PERMANENT CHAIRMAN DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION AT MUSKOGEE, OKLA., FEBRUARY 5, 1920.

"Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the convention, Senator OWEN has rendered lasting patriotic service to the Nation as a Senator, and Oklahoma now tenders him to the Nation for President.

"If partisanship could be eliminated next November, with our distinguished citizen as the nominee, he would receive the unanimous vote of our great State. We do not present him as our favorite son, as much as we love him personally and admire his ability, but we present him as one of the foremost leading national figures of the Nation. He is a resident of Oklahoma, but his statesmanship and qualities of leadership command the thoughtful attention of the entire country. He is no longer a local but a national figure. No man will be made the standard bearer of a great party whose record, public and private, has not been critically examined. It must bear the test of close scrutiny. The people will not elevate a man to the Presidency whose fitness has not been proved. They will not elect him because he is a resident of any particular State. The principles for which he stands must be unmistakable.

"This is no time for untried leadership. The party nominee must not only profess the principles for which he stands but his record must attest his sincerity. He must not only be a man of great ability but of wide experience. He must be a recognized leader of men and must possess such qualities as will command the respect and thoughtful attention of the men and women of the Nation. Since the brave sons of America contributed in such a large measure on the bloody fields of France to destroy despotism and save the liberty of the world, no other Government occupies a more enviable position among the nations of the world. The early ratification of the peace treaty would easily have made the United States the leading nation for generations to come. We must not have a man with a limited partisan vision, but a statesman who is able to grasp questions with an unclouded vision and retain for us the leadership our position among the nations of the world entitles us.

"No other man possesses in such a marked degree all the qualities of leadership as Senator OWEN. Born in the Old Dominion State, almost within the shadow of the home of Jefferson, he came west, a young man with a finished education. Alert in mind, vigorous in body, and determined to assist in the development of the splendid country which afterwards became a part of this Commonwealth, he helped in uniting the seals of the Five Civilized Tribes into the greater seal of the State of Oklahoma. Recognizing his peculiar fitness, the people elected him United States Senator upon our admission to statehood in 1907. He has been twice reelected by practically the unanimous vote of our entire citizenship.

"By education he is splendidly equipped. His entire life has been devoted to a close study of public questions. His analytical mind enables him to carefully examine every subject and view it from every angle. He is a forceful public speaker and a ready debater. For 12 years he has been a commanding figure in the United States Senate. During that time he has taken part in the consideration of all national legislation, and his position on every public question is known throughout the country.

"He has been a great leader in the fight for the things upon which our party will go before the country with confidence and ask for indorsement.

"It has been urged that the Democratic Party is not a constructive party, but who can review the achievements of the party for the past eight years and not be proud of its glorious record. We have enacted more constructive legislation for the benefit of the entire people of this country within that time than our opponents have passed in a quarter of a century. When we came into power, we found a financial system that had been the breeder of panics for a hundred years, and although there had been repeated efforts made to enact satisfactory legislation, the Republican Party was either unable or impotent to do so. While there was some doubt and some criticism as to the effectiveness of the Federal reserve act when it was enacted, Senator OWEN, to whom more credit should be given than any other man in the Nation, at the head of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, piloted the bill through the Senate of the United States, never in doubt that when it was passed his name would be secure in the financial history of the world. Panics like those of 1837, 1873, 1893, and 1907, are no longer possible. The law stood the stress of the World War and assisted our Nation in not only meeting its own financial requirements, but in lending necessary assistance to our Allies across the sea.

"Having faith in the common people of the country, he believed in the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people, which led to the constitutional amendment.

"As everyone can attest, for a quarter of a century, almost single-handed and alone, he fought against strong odds for equal suffrage for the women of the country. With him as the nominee, the women of our State and Nation should rally around our standard with an enthusiasm that no other candidate can arouse.

"He has advocated all progressive legislation, and his vote has been in the interest of humane legislation whenever recorded in the Senate. He early championed the child-labor law, and when one act was found defective and held unconstitutional, he joined with others in securing the enactment of a law that has stood the test of the courts.

"Firmly convinced of the evils of intemperance, he espoused the cause of prohibition and has been one of its leading advocates in the State and Nation.

"Anxious to assist the largest industry of our country, he has actively aided in passing legislation, such as the agricultural-extension act. This law is of particular advantage to farmers. It makes their lands more productive, assists them in marketing their food products, and brings to them that measure of prosperity which is their due.

"From his committee also came that fine piece of constructive legislation known as the farm-loan act, by which the farmers of the Nation can secure long-time loans at low rates of interest, payable on the amortization plan. Foreclosures under this act are unknown and will be negligible. The enactment of this measure had the beneficial effect of lowering the interest rate to farmers and securing for them easier and better terms.

"We have always insisted upon the internal development of our country in such a way as to benefit the plain people, and, with that end in view, appropriations were made to stimulate the building of good roads all over the Nation. If the war had not interfered there would have been more good roads built in the past four years than during the past century.

"It was during the last Cleveland administration that the first appropriation was made to extend the mail service by rural routes to farmers. The service was inaugurated under Postmaster General William L. Wilson. As a result of this experiment, 43,296 of such routes carry mail to millions of people living on the farms of our country.

"Appreciating the necessity of improving public health, he has advocated preventive measures and the establishment of a department of health in our Federal Government. If this legislation is enacted, diseases which have scourged our country in days gone by will be met and conquered. Epidemics will be made impossible.

"In an earnest effort to stimulate education he has advocated and pressed upon the attention of the Senate and the Nation the immense advantage of establishing a department of education. The surprisingly large number of 700,000 men called to the colors during the war who could not read or write emphasizes the need of such legislation.

"Recognized as a close student of financial and economic conditions, he is favorably known to the business world. At the same time he is equally satisfactory to the laboring men of our country, whose cause he has championed. He is alike acceptable to employer and employee.

"For half a century we have been battling against the method of raising revenues with which to pay the expenses of our Government. To place this burden upon the consuming public without reference to earning capacity is indefensible. An amendment to the Constitution authorizing the enactment of legislation providing for an income tax is the result of a political battle waged for many years. Everyone concedes the justness and fairness of such a method of taxation. It places the burden rightfully upon those who have the ability to pay and exempts the woman in the calico dress. When relieved of the burdens incident to the war, these taxes should be reduced to the immediate needs of the Government economically administered. These taxes should be revised and in part reduced now.

"Which of these great constructive measures would the opposition repeal, if intrusted with power? We challenge them to name one.

"The present high prices for all agricultural products and the excellent wages paid for labor are a complete refutation of the old threadbare argument that restoring the Democratic Party to power means low prices and poor wages. Such an argument can never be successfully repeated to an intelligent audience. There was never such an era of prosperity in the history of the country.

"When the war burst upon an unprepared world in 1914, he stood by the chief of our Nation in his efforts to maintain neutrality and prevent our being drawn into it. Ship after ship flying both neutral and American flags carrying American citizens were sent to the bottom of the sea by German submarines in violation of international law. American men, women, and children were murdered and sent to a watery grave. German spies infested our country, causing bridges to be blown up and factories disabled. Public opinion was sought to be stifled through subsidized articles in the public press, and these same agents entered into intrigues for the purpose of involving us in war with our sister Republic on the south and Japan in the Far East. They offered the State of Texas and parts of Arizona, New Mexico, and California as a prize in the event of success. When every effort at a diplomatic settlement had failed, this proud son of Oklahoma, this gallant man of the Nation, stood by the Commander in Chief of the country, and through the dark days that followed the convening of Congress in special session in April, 1917, he gave every assistance in raising and equipping an Army, enlarging and making effective a Navy, and mobilizing the financial and material resources of the Government to overthrow the most despotic autocracy of the world and save liberty for all time.

"There is not an act which was necessary to raise the Army and equip it and provide our soldiers with clothing and munitions and everything to make the Army effective that he did not actively support. No returned soldier, or the father or the mother of one, can point in criticism to any record of Senator OWEN during the World War. Everyone appreciated the necessity of early action upon our part if Paris and the world were to be saved. Delay meant defeat. Our men in millions were thrown across the sea and food, clothing, and munitions were shipped in enormous quantities, enabling our boys to keep the chain encircling Paris from being broken. They won imperishable glory at Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, and the Argonne, and smashed the Hindenburg line. They brought a contemptuous foe to his knees and compelled him to ask for terms of surrender.

"It has been urged that we did not have the constructive ability to enact legislation or the executive ability to conduct a great war. No nation, past or present, has ever raised such an immense Army so quickly and so well equipped, nor has so generously cared for the dependents of soldiers. We enacted a liberal compensation law for the disabled; we provided insurance at a nominal rate; we cared for the loved ones left behind; and we provided for the vocational rehabilitation of soldiers disabled in their country's service. No army was so well fed or clothed, and none returned so morally sound. Now that the war has been won by the loyal, patriotic citizenship of the entire Nation, to all of whom due credit should be given, our opponents claim credit for assisting but refuse to accept the responsibility for any of the mistakes made. Instead of enacting reconstructive legislation, as promised, for the good of the entire country, they are busy with microscopic committees looking for minor errors to criticize, errors committed in the mad rush to make victory certain. The same complaints follow every war, including the Civil War and the Spanish-American War. In our haste to prepare effectively and to save our boys from slaughter, we made large appropriations and many mistakes, but we ended the war gloriously and quickly, saving the lives of perhaps half a million as brave boys as ever wore a uniform or followed a flag to victory.

"The Republicans in the Senate filibustered against the enactment of the necessary appropriation bills last February and March in order to force the convening of Congress in extra session. They outlined an ambitious program. What have they done in the past 10 months to favorably commend them to the country? Not a single notable act has been passed. The Senate, moved by partisanship and personal enmity toward the President, has exhausted the English language in denouncing the peace treaty containing the covenant of the League of Nations. When in Washington last March a draft of the covenant was submitted to Senators for criticism, and changes were made to meet their views upon the President's return to Europe. President Wilson won such a notable victory that he was not only recognized as the first citizen of our Republic but the leading exponent of popular government throughout the world. His place is secure in history. His critics can not detract from the estimate future historians will justly place on his services. If the covenant had contained nothing else but the articles providing for disarmament, for the settlement of international disputes, and the forbidding of secret treaties, they would make for the peace of all countries, reduce the expense of government, and entitle him to the lasting gratitude of mankind.

"As old as history, every nation has been endeavoring to expand its commerce and enlarge its trade relations. We have had trained diplomats and consular agents in every important world city cultivating the friendship of all countries and seeking the avenues through which to enlarge our trade. Within the past few years we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars on our merchant marine in order that the American flag may fly in every port and American bottoms carry our surplus products from the farm, factory, and mine. The war made us the leading financial nation of the world. We had the world trade within our grasp. The great opportunity was ours. We had the confidence of every nation. If the treaty had been ratified at once there would have followed such an expansion of trade and era of prosperity as has never been experienced in our history.

"The spirit of unrest, due to many causes, has been accentuated by the nonratification of the peace treaty and the intemperate criticisms attacking the motives of the President in an effort to prejudice the people against him, as well as the failure to promptly enact reconstructive legislation as promised.

"This record of our distinguished Senator speaks for itself. Let Oklahoma take the lead in presenting it to the people of the Nation. It will challenge the admiration of every loyal man and woman in America and will bring to him the support of forward-looking, liberty-loving people everywhere.

"A deep student of the principles of our Government, a firm believer in equal rights to all and special privileges to none, and a believer in legislation from the standpoint of the plain people of the country, no other man so typically represents the principles advocated by Jefferson, the founder of our party. They were fought for with the utmost tenacity and courage by Andrew Jackson.

"We have had many worthy men for President of the United States. Some of them have made enviable records. When history calmly reviews the record of the present administration and takes into account the long catalogue of constructive legislation enacted for the benefit of the entire citizenship of this great Nation, the services of Woodrow Wilson will be fully appreciated. The record will show how a Nation in 19 months raised and equipped an Army of more than 4,000,000 men and threw over half of them across the sea, bringing the gigantic conflict to a speedy end. In my judgment no other President will compare with him in ability, courage, leadership, or patriotism. He has led this Nation to the highest pinnacle of fame. We must see to it that his successor shall not suffer by contrast."

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi use some more of his time?

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, approach compulsory universal military training in a practical and business way, fully realizing that transportation is now used to capacity, without adding the burden of carrying men in training twice across the country, while they are needed for useful production at home. Save uniforms and maintenance. Do not urge expenditure of our Nation's energy and money to gratify the vanities of war ideas under the guise of necessity. Your Nation does not approve large war preparations. Your people are not enthused, nor do they agree with requirements stated by military men. We must direct all our energies to practical improvements. We have never in our history needed compulsory military training; we need it now less than ever before.

The war is over; the world is heartsore at the appalling souvenir of debt which will exist a hundred years. We must pay for this war before planning another. All human beings must bear their share. None can escape the burden. The people are hopeful and willing to begin reducing this colossal obligation by returning to the business of peace and production. Compulsory universal military training is a long step toward the thin line between peace and war, upon the wrong side of which no nation so committed has ever returned to peaceful ways without frightful loss. During the years of 1914, 1915, 1916, noting Germany's example, the American public were not disposed to give the conduct of our Nation to the Army. Nineteen hundred and nineteen finds a stronger determination that Army insanity shall not be repeated here. Nineteen hunderd and twenty will find us more than ever determined against large war measures. Our country desires instant return to a basis of peace, with prompt and steady reduction of war debt. War preparations and achievements instantly perish while intensive arts of peace forever live. We can not now devote valuable time to elaborate systems of war, tactics, maneuvers, and ordnance, which grow obsolete upon completion and instantly decay. Your Nation's strength is in the minds of men and can not be estimated.

Statisticians inform us that 2,000,000 boys of our recent war were recruited from the farms, and that only 1 per cent of whom have returned to the farm, clearly proving that action in war surely tends to shatter and destroy the home instinct upon which your Nation must depend for enduring power. Will those farmers indorse taking away the remaining sons? Your reliance for future strength and security founded upon anything except the solid rock of home is ephemeral and will decay. In the recent war, as in all wars, Europe's 45 years of developed technical preparation and experience was abandoned at the first Battle of the Marne and new methods adopted. With a nucleus of Annapolis, West Point, and a Regular Army of less than 100,000 men we declared a state of war and achieved what to-day appears a miracle.

Reduce the twenty-five billion debt by curtailing expense, particularly the expense of training, which can better be acquired another way without governmental cost. Make appeal to physical training attractive and competitive. The ideal plan for proper physical and mental development is at home, under the vigilant eye and loving interest of parents and neighbors, within reach of every boy and man in America, with direction of the sheriff or some authorized county official, adopting the Army setting-up exercises and drilling. This plan is safer for health, furnishing superior physical and mental training, saving at least $1,000,000,000 annually to apply upon the enormous war debt, besides adding $1,000,000,000 per year to production; but, regardless of cost, there is a better way for training boys than compulsory. Create a nobler standard, without training camps and military un-American caste; let them be trained in grammar schools, high schools, and colleges; that discipline is for common good and safety of all, not to cheapen a mother's sacrifice of her son to the chances of war, greater for a private without the honors which constantly comes to an officer. Train their bodies and their minds to efficient peace and intensive work.

The scar that war burned into all brave hearts was called "salute." Reorganize the Army, recognize equality before the flag of officers and men who go side by side equally and bring it back unstained. Worth-while officers and men join in aversion to an un-American condition of inequality, degrading to all; away with compulsory universal military training, fostering favoritism, covering with confusion and shame the high character of all valiant men, great in war, yes; but not on account of rank, but in spite of it; proven by returning useful citizens to private life.

The next war maniac of history will be promptly hung and men who vote vast war plans will be retired. The last war maniac became crazed because the philosophers and scientific men of his nation trusted to war preparedness more than to the human, physical, and mental capacity. No war preparation will endure beyond the making. Battleships are out of date before completion. War glory has vanished from the minds of men, leaving only a fevered memory of sleepless nights and days of horror, ravaged homes and tortured death, women and children without hope, moaning in agony.

There are better things in the lives of mature men than planning force and compulsion upon bright and hopeful boys. American boys without the compulsory military training traveled 3,000 miles and met life-trained men, who were considered the crack troops of all the world; our boys drove those veteran soldiers off the field, and only the armistice saved driving them from the earth. Sergt. York, with more love of home than for military, broke all trained-soldier records. You will create invincible protectors of your Nation by inspiring in the hearts of men devotion to their homes.

Our Nation worked its way along through dangerous periods and perilous times while we were weak and dangers assailed from many directions. We must not abandon the plain and well-tried rules which were our safety when our numbers were few. The cautions and conditions which brought strength will preserve and increase that power. No sane Government has occasion to and therefore does not fear us, because we do not threaten their safety; our record satisfies them of honest intent to respect their rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of their destiny. Where there is no fear there can be no hate nor suspicion.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine and one-half minutes.

Mr. QUIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the rest of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, concerning the present railway crisis I read the following copy of a letter which I sent to the President:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 12, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: May I express the sincere hope that you will not permit Mr. Hines to accede to present railroad demands. A show-down must come sooner or later, and now is the opportune time. The American people are ready for it.

Within the past few months I have received over 5,000 communications from prominent Democrats over the United States, some from every congressional district, asserting that if the administration truckles to another demand from organized labor they will no longer vote the Democratic ticket. They are of the opinion that Congress should never have passed the Adamson law, that Director McAdoo should never have paid over the $754,000,000, that Director Hines should never have paid over the extra $67,000,000, that he should never have paid over the additional millions later granted by him, and that a proper antistrike clause should be placed in the railroad bill.

Of course, we all know that Republicans in Congress have done just as much if not more truckling to organized labor demands as have Democrats, but the whole blame is put on the Democratic administration by the general public. Texas is ordinarily 95 per cent Democratic. If there is any more truckling it will take unusual efforts for us to carry it.

But this is more than a mere party question. Americans all over the United States, Republicans and Democrats alike, are just as much opposed to an autocracy of labor as they are to an autocracy of capital. The Baltimore Star for February 10, 1920, cites five Baltimore & Ohio Railway engineers who received $503.10 per month and conductors who received $351.60 per month. I can give you the names of several unskilled shopmen in Temple, Tex., who received more than $500 in one month. We must profit by Gov. Coolidge's election as an expression of American decision.

Very respectfully and cordially,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

TO THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

I also have a letter here which I have received from Mr. E. H. Horton, president of the Grand Division, Order of Railroad Station Agents of the United States of America, dated Washington, D. C., February 12, 1920, wherein he says:

[Grand Division, Order of Railroad Station Agents, Earl H. Morton, president, Hotel Continental, Washington, D. C.; Wilbur L. Heacox, grand secretary, Manor, Pa.; W. H. McCloskey, assistant grand secretary, Pittsburgh, Pa.; J. H. Weir, grand treasurer, Canton, Mass.; Central Headquarters, Blackstone Building, 345 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Eastern Headquarters, Paddock Building, 101 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 12, 1920.

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am inclosing a few thoughts entitled "The Truth About the American Federation of Labor," in which I mentioned your name.

You have my permission to make such use of this as you see fit.

Very truly, yours,

E. H. MORTON, President.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

An American Federation of Labor circular says: "The free institutions of our country are menaced." They certainly are, and by no other trust, corporation, or group of individuals than the American Federation of Labor itself. It is time records and history of that highly organized body were aired to the general public. It would be advisable that not only aspirants for Congress should have their "records analyzed," as Mr. Gompers suggests, but even Mr. Gompers himself and his highly paid I. W. W. organizers.

Further quoting from the above questioned article we read: "It is intolerable that a people who spared no cost to make the world safe for democracy should be forced to submit to any restriction of the glorious liberties inherited from the founders of our Nation."

This from men in industries who help make "the world safe for democracy" by receiving a daily stipend of from $6 to $20 and $30 a day in wages. And this is called "patriotism." In order that they should not "be forced to submit to any restriction, they walked out on strikes and with threats of strikes threatened to disrupt the country's plans for winning the war. So disastrous and dangerous did these "lovers of freedom" become that Congress had to pass legislation making it unlawful to strike for the duration of the war. Fine loyalty, that. If their efforts had been met by any less restriction our democracy to-day would have been an autocracy of radicalism. Why has not the report of the hearings before the Senate Education and Labor Committee last November, 1919, been aired to the public? There it was shown in black and white that the then striking steel "toilers" were receiving $10, $20, and $30 a day, while employees of the United States Government received less than $10. Yet because one employee out of every five was dissatisfied with his pay envelope, a strike was organized and maintained by Mr. Gompers's paid menial who had formerly been an I. W. W. advocate, but who had undergone, as he said, "a change of heart."

The circular further states that "many Congressmen have endeavored to enact legislation providing for compulsory labor." When organized labor, 3,000,000 strong, threatens to discontinue the production and disrupt the distribution of commodities and necessities required by the general public of this country, it is high time legislation was enacted demanding "compulsory labor." Further, the American Federation of Labor says, "Despite the patriotism and sacrifices of the masses of labor of America during the World War the effort has been made to repress free association, free speech, and free press." The "patriotism" and "sacrifice" (?) of the masses we have already commented upon. If "free association" means right to strike at any time on little or no provocation, if it means the disintegration of law and order, as shown in the Boston police strike, if "free speech" and "free press" means the utterance and issuing of propaganda of a misleading and deceptive character, then it is indeed time Congressmen with the "backbone" of a BLANTON and the fearlessness of Gov. Coolidge of Massachusetts "repressed" such freedom.

This federation says "Constructive legislation has never been so essential to secure the defeat of labor's enemies and the election of its friends and supporters." Does this mean the American Federation of Labor—3,000,000 strong—wishes to become the autocratic power, with only men pledged as their loyal supporters in Congress legislating for the whole people? Are these the "lovers of freedom" who desire such stupendous self-interest in the United States Government? This is something that even organized capital in its palmier day never did—come out boldly and publicly announce a political campaign whereby only its "friends and supporters" would control the Government of the country. Such temerity and effrontery on the part of the American Federation of Labor deserves the awakening of our citizens to this startling statement and all it signifies. As Speaker GILLETT so ably expressed it, "It is a question whether the combinations of the employed are not more threatening to our business life than those of the employers." It is more than that. It has ceased to be a "question" in any thinking and informed person's mind. It is a fact as evinced by this exposure of the undercurrent of the American Federation of Labor systematic campaign of "strikes and threats of strikes," for the past five years.

An effort was made to adjust labor difficulties fairly and justly by the assembling of a labor conference called by the President at Washington in November, 1919. Those who read recall it was divided into three groups—labor, employers, and the public. At that time labor had the full support and sympathy of the public group. Not satisfied by this open and fair arrangement, nor by the friendship of the public, labor, headed by Mr. Gompers, injected into this conference a radical element which not only lost him the support of the public group, but succeeded in disrupting the whole conference and so neutralized all efforts at a "just and right" settlement of labor's problems. It is a question now in our minds whether the American Federation of Labor had the success of this conference really at heart; whether they truly desired a peaceful settlement of labor's problems or whether even then they were not anticipating such a spectacular political coup d'état as they have just committed.

Justice Stafford, of the District Supreme Court, says: "The public has been the scapegoat on all labor controversies. The public must take things into its own hands and organize for its own protection."

If organized labor is, as it says, "partisan to principles—the principles of freedom, of justice, and of democracy," why does it launch a campaign to defeat those very principles—a campaign with a slogan of "stand faithfully by our friends and defeat our enemies," which being interpreted means, "Put in Congress only those men who——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY] is recognized for four and one-half minutes.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. I desire to read for the information of the House a letter from Swift & Co.:

SWIFT & CO.,
UNION STOCK YARDS,
Chicago, February 7, 1920.

Congressman JOHN W. RAINEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the course of a debate on the Agricultural appropriation bill on Thursday, February 5, Congressman YOUNG of Texas and Congressman TINCHER, of Kansas, made some remarks about the packing business which put that industry in an entirely wrong light.

Mr. YOUNG stated that the farmers in his section, although located only 60 miles from Fort Worth, Tex., shipped their cattle to St. Louis, Chicago, and Kansas City in order to get a fair price, and intimated that this was due to unfair practices on the part of the packers who owned plants in Fort Worth as well as in these other cities.

It is undoubtedly true that cattlemen in Texas frequently ship their fat stock to St. Louis and Kansas City, but it is questionable whether they receive any better net price by so doing. It is also true that the local market for the best grade of beef sold at Fort Worth is to a certain extent restricted. If any great quantity of very heavy cattle were marketed in Fort Worth, a large part of the resulting beef would have to be shipped to distant markets. In any event, competition is bound to keep the price at Fort Worth in line with prices in other markets.

So far as Swift & Co. is concerned, however, we stand ready to prove that we have paid for fat cattle and all other cattle at Fort Worth every cent that these cattle have been worth as compared with the prices we have been able to get for the resulting meats and by-products. We further proclaim that there has been no manipulation of prices of any kind and that competition forces us to pay for cattle all that they are worth in whichever market we buy them.

Mr. YOUNG says that the farmers have to sell their cattle at whatever price the packers see fit to give, and that they, the packers, have bankrupted thousands of cattlemen and driven them into other businesses.

The truth is that the packers can not and do not arbitrarily determine the price of cattle, because they have to be governed, first, by the price obtainable for meat and by-products, and, second, by the competition of other packers. We do not and can not control the price of meat in any way; it fluctuates from week to week and from day to day.

During the drop in cattle prices the past year wholesale meat prices received by Swift & Co. have dropped fully as much as the price of live cattle. As a matter of fact Swift & Co. lost money on its total cattle operations during 1919. The profit on our total business of all kinds was less than 7 per cent on investment, and only 1¼ cents in each dollar of sales. Do these facts, which may be readily verified, justify Mr. YOUNG in making his claim that the packers have "bankrupted" thousands of cattlemen?

Mr. YOUNG and Mr. TINCHER both referred to the packers as having a monopoly. Sooner or later all charges of this sort are bound to cease, because they are not in accordance with the facts. Swift & Co. competes with every other packer in the purchase of live stock and in the sale of meats, and has no agreement or understanding with other packers. We challenge Mr. YOUNG or Mr. TINCHER, or anyone else interested in this problem, to show that there is any form of combination among the packers to affect prices.

Mr. YOUNG's statement that the packers have obtained control over the cotton-oil and peanut-oil markets is ridiculous. Swift & Co. manufactures no peanut oil, and our proportion of the total business in cotton oil is so small that there is no suggestion whatever of monopoly power. Even the Federal Trade Commission reports that Swift & Co. produces only 4.6 per cent of the crude cotton oil of the country and only 10.3 per cent of the refined cotton oil.

The statement that the packers are trying to drive the grocers out of business is equally ridiculous, especially at a time when the large packers have just agreed with the Attorney General to stop handling grocery lines. The five large packers had been handling only about 3 per cent of the total wholesale grocery business of the country even before this agreement was entered into.

We believe that Members of the House of Representatives will be interested in these facts, and we are sure that their sense of fair play will permit you to controvert the statements of Mr. YOUNG and Mr. TINCHER by introducing this letter into the RECORD if you are interested in doing so.

Very truly, yours,

LOUIS F. SWIFT.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] has also expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield a quarter of a minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I recently made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remaining portion of the letter I was reading from be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. CARSS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have asked this unanimous consent for the purpose of incorporating in the RECORD the very remarkable correspondence which has been published in the newspapers to-day between the President of the United States on the one hand and the Secretary of State on the other.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROGERS. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] did not carry with it the right to put that kind of material in the RECORD, and I shall object to his putting in the correspondence between Mr. Lansing and the President.

Mr. ROGERS. I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks generally. The gentleman from Texas or any other gentleman had the right to inquire upon what subject, if he wished. He did not seek to exercise that privilege, and he has lost his right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that under the request preferred by the gentleman from Massachusetts he does not have the right to put in this RECORD under unanimous consent the correspondence between the President and Mr. Lansing when objection is raised, unless it is specially agreed to here at the time, and I will state that I object to the insertion of that matter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, for the reason that the objectionable matter, if it is objectionable, has not been placed in the RECORD, and therefore no point of order against it is proper at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to it going in.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman can not object.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can object, but the objection does not amount to anything.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at the gentleman from Texas, who considers himself one of the leaders on the Democratic side of the House. Earlier in the day he saw fit to interpose an objection when I asked permission to print the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the President. I can not conceive how any gentleman on the Democratic side can object to having incorporated in the RECORD documents of this kind. Can it be that they regard these documents as so discreditable to the administration of which they are a part that they are not willing to have publicity attach to them? I do not know what other motive there can be. The gentleman from Texas probably uses up more paper by his remarks and extensions of remarks than any other Member of this House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman bringing me into his discussion.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Texas brought himself in.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman has no right to bring me into his discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. He did not mention the gentleman's name.

Mr. BLANTON. He did mention my name. I put him on notice now that if he puts that Lansing correspondence in the RECORD no other extension of remarks is going to be made by any gentleman on his side of the House—not another one.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be protected in the use of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas if he is objecting to the company in which the gentleman from Massachusetts has placed him in associating him with the President and the Secretary of State?

Mr. BLANTON. No, sir; I am not. I object to his bringing me into his partisan political discussion that he is bringing before the House now.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to find out how much of my time is left after the gentleman from Texas has sat down?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to state to this House that these documents to which I have alluded, and which I had hoped to discuss more fully, are historical documents. They are not merely of the moment. They are not of to-morrow or of next month or next year. They are permanent history, which the House ought to be able to turn to at any moment in order to refresh its memory as to what was said. Early in the European war the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] adopted the practice, which I thought was a most admirable one, of putting into the RECORD from week to week or from month to month the great State papers that passed between this country and the other countries of the globe, making that material readily available to anyone who might desire to consult it. My purpose is precisely the same. Whether we agree with the President of the United States or the Secretary of State is not the question. Both sides are presented in this correspondence. I desire simply to have the country put on notice that this correspondence can be found readily at any moment when anyone desires to consult it. I suspect that every man in this House has the same viewpoint upon the merits of the controversy, but it is not my purpose in making this request to deal at all with the merits of the case.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. I am not making any objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand.

Mr. DENT. But where does the gentleman expect to get the original documents to put in the RECORD? Does he get them from the newspapers?

Mr. ROGERS. The documents which were published in the newspapers to-day are said to have been given out by the State Department last evening. I have heard no question raised as to their authenticity, and I am content to accept them as a correct statement of the actual correspondence that passed between the two gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlman from Massachusetts has expired.

[The correspondence referred to will be found in the Senate proceedings for Saturday, Feb. 14, 1920, pp. 2882–2883.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two or three letters and a statement printed in a newspaper concerning the activities of Gen. Pershing at the front. Last October the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Gen. SHERWOOD] made the statement that Gen. Pershing was never at the front line. I have here letters from soldiers who saw him at the front line while under fire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein two or three letters and a statement relative to the military service of Gen. Pershing, which statement has been published in the newspapers. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will state that under ordinary circumstances I would not do so; but this morning the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] asked permission to insert the Lansing-Wilson correspondence. I objected and others objected. I rose a moment ago, being recognized under general debate——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12467, the Military Academy bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. MINAHAN of New Jersey, one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. MARTIN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ORDERLY PROCEDURE OF THE HOUSE AND THE RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order concerning the orderly procedure of the House and the RECORD. This morning the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] made a unanimous-consent request to place in the RECORD the Wilson-Lansing correspondence. At the time I and other Members objected. Later on, a few minutes ago, in Committee of the Whole, he was granted time by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, under general debate, and rose in his place and asked to be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. I submit that that meant remarks he was to make under general debate, which would be made under the rules of the House, and which over objection would not admit the placing in the RECORD of the Wilson-Lansing correspondence. Knowing the rules of the House, I did not object. Immediately after unanimous consent was granted the gentleman from Massachusetts indicated that under that grant he intended to place in the RECORD the Lansing-Wilson correspondence, to which objection was made this morning. I immediately rose and called the attention of the Chairman of the committee to the facts above stated and raised the point of order in the committee that under that state of facts existing it was not proper for the gentleman from Massachusetts to place in the RECORD the Wilson-Lansing correspondence.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules of the House controlling such matters and under the circumstances as they exist the gentleman from Massachusetts is not entitled to place in the RECORD the Wilson-Lansing correspondence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the extension of remarks in the RECORD in the Committee of the Whole is within the control of the committee. The House has no control over the matter until it has been inserted in the RECORD, and when it has been inserted by permission in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, then the House has control of it only when a motion is made to expunge it from the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that if a distinguished Member of the House, such as I took the gentleman from Massachusetts to be, will take advantage of the unanimous-consent permission obtained under the circumstances stated, it will force me hereafter to object to all unanimous-consent requests made from his side of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, February 16, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the chairman of the Lincoln Memorial Commission submitting a proposed paragraph of legislation for inclusion in the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. Doc. No. 649), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. McKENZIE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12507) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment and road-making material to various services and departments of the Government, and for the use of the States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 634), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11398) for the creation of the Custer State Park game sanctuary, in the State of South Dakota, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 635), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6092) for the relief of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 633), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which were referred sundry bills of the House, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 12530) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, accompanied by a report (No. 632), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12425) for the relief of Orlando Ducker, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 12530) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; to the Committee of the Whole House.

By Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana: A bill (H. R. 12531) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to transfer free of charge to the Department of the Interior certain motor-propelled vehicles; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROSE: A bill (H. R. 12532) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Williamsburg, Blair County, Pa., one German cannon or fieldpiece, or other war trophies; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12533) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Tyrone, Blair County, Pa., a German cannon or fieldpiece, or other war trophies; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12534) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Johnstown, Cambria County, Pa., a German cannon, fieldpiece, or other war trophies; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DARROW: A bill (H. R. 12535) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to Lieut. Henry H. Houston Post No. 3, the American Legion, Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., two German cannon or fieldpieces, carriages, and equipment, with a suitable number of shells; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TREADWAY: A bill (H. R. 12536) authorizing a bond issue for the benefit of the veterans of the World War; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KINKAID: A bill (H. R. 12537) to provide for an examination and report on the condition and possible irrigation development of the Imperial Valley, Calif.; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. MASON: Resolution (H. Res. 463) requesting an investigation of the State Department; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Resolution (H. Res. 464) authorizing an investigation into the price of sugar; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. SABATH: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 293) directing the Shipping Board not to sell certain ships and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the Shipping Board to adopt rules and regulations permitting the purchase, carrying, serving, and sale of alcoholic beverages on vessels registered in foreign trade flying the American flag; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. KLECZKA: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 294) authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the Allies and associated powers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOTT: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 51) expressing regret at the resignation of Robert Lansing; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 16, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts to Thee and ask Thy gracious favor upon the work of this day. The problems which confront us are of such far-reaching importance that we dare not face the possibility of making mistakes. So we come to Thee, the author of truth, and who canst put our hearts and minds in frame for the solemn responsibilities that come upon us in this new day of the world's life, and we pray Thee to guide us by Thine unerring counsel. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, February 13, 1920, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 223).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations in the sum of $16,933.75 required by the War Department for the fiscal years 1919 and 1920, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 3202. An act granting leave of absence to officers of the Coast Guard, and for other purposes; and

S. 3722. An act to grant the consent of Congress to the Alfords Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Savannah River.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11960) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PORTER, Mr. ROGERS, and Mr. FLOOD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a certified copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Nevada ratifying the Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution extending the right of suffrage to women, which will be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIAL. I present resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina on the Armenian question, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A concurrent resolution.

"Whereas the awful conditions that now exist in Armenia, and have existed for centuries, while free and powerful nations sat idly by, satisfying themselves with mild protests that were absolutely ineffectual in preventing the horrible massacres, the pitiable deportation of whole Provinces, the slaughter of helpless children by the thousands, and the violation of innocent women, more than 50,000 of whom are now confined by the unspeakable Turk in Moslem harems, with the brand of disgrace tattooed in their faces and the threat of death hanging over them in the event of escape, constitute a blot upon civilization and a reproach to Christian nations that have permitted such things to continue from year to year until now the time has come for great and powerful America to say to the Turk, 'This thing must stop and never occur again,' and say it in terms that mean what she says; and

"Whereas a resolution, introduced by Senator JOHN SHARPE WILLIAMS and indorsed by Senator LODGE and others, is now pending in the Congress of the United States looking to the recognition and protection of Armenia as a free and independent republic: Now be it

"Resolved by the Senate of South Carolina (the House concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America, through the Representatives of the State of South Carolina in said Congress, be respectfully memorialized and urged to take such immediate steps as may be necessary to safeguard the future of these Christian Armenians, who have kept the faith in spite of every species of torture and horror inflicted upon them by the devilish cruelty since the year 303 A. D., when they established their first church at the foot of Mount Ararat, the resting place of the ark, where God painted His rainbow in the east as a sign of His covenant with man that the world should never again be destroyed by flood; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and to each member of the South Carolina delegation in said Houses."

On immediate consideration the concurrent resolution was adopted, ordered sent to the house for concurrence.

On February 10, 1920, the house concurred.

A true and correct copy. Attested February 11, 1920.

[SEAL.] W. BANKS DOVE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 14, 1920.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The country is with you in opposition to sale of ships. Many people have never understood why about 30 of the first ships completed in our shipyards were turned over to France and Italy, nor why of the German ships interned in this country, as a neutral nation, which after we entered the war should have become the property of the United States, a number of the best should have been turned over to England. There have been many things done in this respect which the people of the United States neither understand nor approve, and the statement of Chairman Payne lacks much of making clear the necessity for the action proposed now to be taken. We have for years past been deploring the loss of our merchant marine and urging its restoration, and there was never a time when a greater necessity or better opportunity for the consummation of our needs existed than now.

E. B. STAHLMAN.

Mr. McKELLAR. I also present a petition of the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion of the United States of America, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRIVATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS LEGION
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1920.

To the honorable the VICE PRESIDENT AND THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED:

We respectfully present the following petition:

"Resolved by the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion, That we hereby petition the President and Congress of the United States to take all necessary steps at once to prevent the proposed sale by the United States Shipping Board to a private corporation of the fleet of former German ships or any other ships owned by the United States Government.

"Resolved, That we respectfully request the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled to appoint select committees to investigate this proposed sale of Government ships with a view to disclosing whether there is in connection therewith any violation of law or sacrifice of the public's interests and, if so, to prevent or punish the same."

Respectfully submitted.

PRIVATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS LEGION,
MARVIN GATES SPERRY, National President.
[SEAL.] E. L. SEAL, National Secretary.

Mr. CURTIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Vesper, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Smith-Towner bill for the establishment of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of the National Guard Association of the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation for the establishment of a National Guard corps in the Regular Army, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Gronna wheat-guaranty bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Stone River Post, No. 74, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Sedan, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Elbing, Moundridge, and Whitewater, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of James Canfield Post, No. 38, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Minnesota, of Glenwood; of J. L. Heywood Post, No. 83, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Minnesota, of Northfield; of William Moore Post, No. 92, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Minnesota, of Black River Falls; and of Levi Butler Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Minnesota, of Minneapolis, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution of Lusk Post, No. 4, Wyoming Branch of the American Legion, favoring universal military training, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented petitions of A. W. Dodge Post, No. 44, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maryland, of Baltimore; of Denison Post, No. 8, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maryland, of Hampden, Baltimore; of Wilson Post, No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maryland, of Baltimore; and of Dushane Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maryland, of Baltimore, all in the State of Maryland, praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Diego, Calif., praying for the early ratification of the peace treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Sequoia Post, No. 96, American Legion, of Fort Bragg, Calif., praying for the passage of the so-called Davey sedition bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry veterans of the Civil War, of Coleman, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Rotary Club of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for the adoption of universal military training, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Michigan Branch of the Committee of Forty-eight, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Esch-Cummins railroad bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of the Rotary Club of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for universal military training, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a memorial of the Committee of Forty-eight, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Cummins-Esch railroad bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

H. R. 202. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple to the county of Huron, in the State of Michigan, for a certain described tract of land for public park purposes;

H. R. 6136. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands to school district No. 21, of Fremont County, Wyo.; and

H. R. 6772. An act authorizing and directing the transfer of 10 acres of land to rural high-school district No. 1, Lapwai, Idaho.

Mr. KNOX, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 302) for the relief of Thomas Simmons, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS (by request):

A bill (S. 3913) for the relief of the estate of George W. Clayton; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3914) granting an increase of pension to Walter F. Davidson (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3915) granting an increase of pension to John W. Pfaff; and

A bill (S. 3916) granting a pension to William J. Cecil (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 3917) granting a pension to Maria C. Vance; and

A bill (S. 3918) granting a pension to Hannah J. Grove; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LENROOT:

A bill (S. 3919) to correct the military record of William B. Johns; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BECKHAM:

A bill (S. 3920) granting a pension to Nathan L. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3921) granting a pension to Mary E. Reynolds; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 3925) granting a pension to Emma Braunlich (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3926) granting a pension to Mary Frankenberger (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 3927) granting an increase of pension to Peter Vandyke; to the Committee on Pensions.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. OWEN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 158) requesting the United States Shipping Board to defer the sale of vessels taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to give notice of a proposed amendment to Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

All debate when any matter is, under the rules, properly before the Senate shall be confined to such matter, and the question as to whether such debate is pertinent or not shall, when the point of order is made, be decided by the Presiding Officer without debate; and if his decision is not overruled on appeal, and is that the Senator having the floor is not speaking in order, such Senator shall take his seat and shall not speak again except upon the subject before the Senate.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. ASHURST. I offer the following resolution and ask that it be read. It is my purpose to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 307) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, requested to defer until further action by Congress the sale or transfer of the fleet of vessels or any individual vessel taken over by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the Great War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Under the circumstances which confront us I do not believe it is proper for the Senate to pass the resolution. I wish the Senator would have it go to the Committee on Commerce. I will say to him that we expect to have the chairman of the Shipping Board before us to-morrow morning and give us all the facts that may be brought out to-day with reference to the bids that are submitted. I assure the Senator that the committee will act promptly and make a recommendation based upon the facts which are disclosed.

I rather doubt the wisdom, until we have the information, of the Senate taking positive action and directing that no sale shall be made. The chairman of the Shipping Board has assured the committee that nothing definite will be done by the board upon the bids and proposals until the matter has been submitted to the Commerce Committee. It seems to me that that protects all the rights of the Government and the public to the very fullest possible extent.

I feel that it would really be a reflection upon the assurance of the chairman of the Shipping Board if the Senate should pass a resolution like this. In view of that situation, without expressing any opinion as to the merits of the proposition, I feel that I shall have to object to the consideration by the Senate of the resolution by unanimous consent. I wish that it would be referred to the committee, and, as I said, I assure the Senator the committee will act promptly in the matter and gather all the facts just as soon as it can.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he can not further assure the Senator from Arizona that the Commerce Committee will not approve of the sale without giving an opportunity to the Senate to express its sentiment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to be heard for a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Senator can be heard.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not desire to reflect on the Shipping Board, neither will I permit the suggestion that I am about to reflect on it to deter me from the performance of a duty.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce. He is a distinguished statesman; he honors the Senate with his presence here and with his industrious habits. The Senate Committee on Commerce is composed of some of the ablest Senators in this Chamber. That does not, however, foreclose me from the right to ask the Senate to perform one of its functions. The committee is only the creature, the child, the agency, the instrument of the Senate, and I believe it is the sense of the Senate that the ex-German ships should not be sold until Congress further directs.

Mr. President, we are to-day in the doldrums. The Nation is discouraged because Congress has from time to time taken orders from the executive departments. We are the servants of the people, not servants of the departments. It is time the American people knew that their Senators and their Representatives are not further taking orders from the departments, but are taking orders from the people. I have learned that these departments are wrong about 50 per cent of the time, and I have also learned that when Congress does not use its own untrammeled judgment Congress usually falls into the pit.

So, Mr. President, I must not be put into the attitude of reflecting on the Shipping Board when I offer this resolution. I asked unanimous consent for its present consideration, so that the country may know for a verity that this fleet of ex-German ships will not be sold.

I want the American people to know that the Shipping Board shall not settle this question, but that Congress shall settle the question for the American people. That is all I ask. There is no politics in this question. It is not a matter of partisanship. It is the administration to which I am attached that is about to make the sale of the ships, and I regret that the Senator's party is the party which is to stay the hand that is trying to prevent the sale.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say that I did not think that the Senator would reflect upon the Shipping Board. I said, or at any rate I intended to say, that if the Senate passed the resolution, it would be a reflection upon the chairman of the Shipping Board, in view of the circumstances of the situation.

Mr. ASHURST. What circumstances?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We had Mr. Payne before the Commerce Committee, and Mr. Payne assured us in the most positive way that the sale would not be consummated until the matter had been submitted to the committee and to the Senate, and he expressed perfect willingness to do nothing in the matter, if after the facts were presented the committee even should request him not to proceed, and especially that they would not do anything if the Senate should pass a resolution requesting them not to proceed with the sale.

Mr. ASHURST. Has the committee requested him not to proceed with the sale?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The committee has been assured by him that he will not proceed with the sale until the committee can have a further hearing in the matter, which the committee expects to do to-morrow, so as to get the facts that are presented by the bids that I understand are to be received to-day. Those are the circumstances which led me to make the suggestion.

If the Senator will permit me, I think I can agree with every word he has said thus far except the suggestion that this side of the Chamber is trying to permit this sale. That is not correct.

Mr. ASHURST. I will withdraw that then and say that the Senator from Washington and not the other side is standing in the way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the Senator from Washington is not standing in the way.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Washington made the objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The resolution has nothing to do with preventing the sale. The chairman of the Shipping Board has assured the Senator from Washington as chairman of the Commerce Committee, and the Commerce Committee, that the sale will not be perfected until after the committee shall have had a full opportunity to consider the matter and the facts that may be presented.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The sale will not be consummated. I agree with all the other suggestions of the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope Congress will assert itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada calls for the regular order, and that stops the debate. The resolution goes over under the rule.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12272. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

LETTER OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I direct the attention of the Senate to a letter written by the Vice President of the United States to one E. G. Hoffman, of Fort Wayne, Ind., which appears in this morning's Washington Post. This letter is so sensible, so statesmanlike, so completely in accord with the ancient traditions of Democracy, as I understand them, and is in other respects so different from many of the programs recently outlined for the Democratic Party of 1920, that I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD. [A pause.] Is my request granted, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is very embarrassing for the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, from the embarrassment of the Chair, I shall assume that the request is granted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not much in favor of filling up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with his letters.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Another presidential campaign impends. Thus far the President, who is the chief of our party, has not deemed it expedient to express his opinion as to what the issues will be. As I am desirous of being a delegate at large from the State of Indiana, I wish, in consonance with what I hope has been my entire public career, to state the substance of what I think the Democratic Party should stand for. I would not want to go under any misapprehension as to my views upon the part of the unfaltering Democrats of Indiana.

"We were in the war from the very moment of its European beginning because it affected our internal affairs. All of the methods and measures adopted for the preservation of the peace of our country and the winning of the war met with my approval, and I am ready to defend them.

"The war is now over and the rehabilitation of America as well as the rest of the world is taking place. It is not possible to accomplish our rehabilitation other than through the instrumentalities of political parties. How shall the Democratic Party propose to rehabilitate the political system of America if intrusted with power is the question.

"I have watched in other countries the effects of so-called unbridled democracy, and I have seen its menace in this country until I am quite convinced that the peace, prosperity, and perpetuity of the American Republic must rest finally upon a few ancient and time-honored Democratic doctrines.

"No one save God can remove the individual as the unit of good government. Legislative efforts to produce justice and good order in society by listening and acceding to the demands of persons and classes will in the hour of peace produce failure. The only sure foundation for a stable republic must rest upon the Jeffersonian doctrine of equal and exact justice to all men and special privileges to none. In no other way can the individual exercise his inalienable right to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness.

DEMANDS OLD-TIME PLATFORM.

"The Democratic Party should stand for this and pledge itself to rebuild the American political structure along this line by clearly dividing its citizens into the law-abiding and lawbreaking; making its laws rest equally upon all men; permitting the individual citizen who is honest to succeed by honest methods; giving to no citizen legislative advantage; speedily punishing anyone who unjustly obtains success by crooked and dishonest means; recognizing that this is still a federation of States; demanding that the States discharge the duties of local self-government; resisting the usurpations of the General Government; removing corrupt and biased judges, but standing always for obedience to the decrees of court and to constituted authority; insisting that the legislative branch of the Government shall be responsible for the discharge of its duty and serving notice upon it that it can not skulk behind an alleged interference upon the part of the executive branch; electing an Executive pledged to discharge the countless officials and innumerable agents made necessary by the war and to administer public affairs along economic lines, even to the point of the veto of every bill carrying not only unnecessary and ill-advised appropriations but appropriations for the benefit of a few citizens rather than for the common good; regulating strictly every public utility; and by punishing all those seeking to profiteer either personally or through aggregated combinations of men or money; in short, the presentation to the people for their suffrages of a man upon an old-time Democratic platform, under the principles of which the Republic for so many years was contented, prosperous, and invincible.

"If a faith of this kind appeals to the Democrats of Indiana, I desire to go as a delegate at large to the convention at San Francisco to advocate this kind of a platform and to ascertain whether everything that made the Republic great was right or wrong."

INTEREST RATES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before the war Belgium for 50 years had a 3 per cent rate of interest per annum. It was a fair rate. France had a 3 per cent rate, and even small sums were loaned by the Bank of France at 3 per cent. United States bonds with currency privilege, bearing 2 per cent, sold at par before the war. London during the war has loaned money to merchants on acceptances at 3½ per cent.

The manufacturers, merchants, and business men of the United States are entitled to stable, moderate interest rates.

They have this right interfered with by the violent fluctuations authorized and practiced in New York and Boston on stock-exchange collateral loans. The call-loan rates are arbitrarily fixed from low rates to 30 per cent, and a bull market or a bear market follows, of course, as cause and effect.

The high rate is fixed avowedly to check speculation, but speculation can be otherwise checked by raising the margins and declining to loan beyond a reasonable proportion of the bank's resources and by limiting the loans of the Federal reserve bank to banks which persist in this harmful policy.

These high rates on call loans on the stock exchange has seriously affected the interest rates in our vast commercial business, and even the Federal Reserve Board has raised the rates of the Federal reserve banks to 6 per cent for member banks, which means 7 and 8 per cent for the customers of the member banks.

Against this destructive policy, which adds to the high cost of living, I protest. I have written a letter to the President, which I ask to submit for the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 13, 1920.

Subject: Interest rates.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I deem it my duty to call your attention and the attention of your administration to the importance of moderate interest rates and stability therein in the United States and the important part which the influence of the Government can exert in accomplishing these ends through the Treasury Department, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Federal Reserve Board.

Before the Great War Belgium had a fixed, stable rate of 3 per cent for 50 years and the rate in France was practically the same, and United States Government bonds with the circulation privilege were sold at and above par when they bore only 2 per cent interest.

During the World War London merchants have enjoyed a 3½ per cent rate on acceptances.

Our manufacturers, our merchants, our business men are entitled to reliable, stable, reasonable rates of interest.

The productive and distributive processes so essential to restore the equilibrium of the world depend upon such rates in order to function most efficiently.

I call your attention to the unreasonable manner in which the interest rates on the stock collateral loans in New York have been fluctuating from normal to 25 and 30 per cent, with the most unhappy consequences upon interest rates, injuriously affecting our commercial business throughout the United States.

The Federal Reserve Board has been induced to raise the rate of discount of the Federal reserve banks to a high point as a supposed check on the extraordinary speculation which has been taking place on the stock exchange.

These artificially unreasonable high rates of interest charged by the banks in the central cities on stock collateral call loans have had the effect of drawing to these cities from different parts of the country funds which ought to be exclusively used in commerce, and this process went to a point where recently the amount of stock collateral exchange loans on call or short time reached a volume in New York City of $1,900,000,000, withdrawing for speculative purposes these credits which should be used in the industrial and commercial life of the country.

The investing and speculating public has been attracted to the stock exchange by the policy of narrow margins and low rates of interest; but after the public has taken on these speculative purchases the interest rates are raised to a high point and the margins are increased from 10 per cent to 20 and 30 per cent, with the effect of squeezing out the people who, in the language of the day, "can't hold on."

These loans, which were $1,900,000,000 60 days ago, have now been reduced to $1,000,000,000, and the stock market has gone through a very severe depreciation; and this is the second upheaval of this kind within two months. I inclose an exhibit showing the violent fluctuations which have taken place contrary to a wise public policy, to the ruin of many weak and foolish speculators; but, above all, to the injury of the manufacturers, merchants, and business men who are entitled to have stable, moderate interest rates.

The manufacturers, merchants, and business men are entitled to stability. They can not otherwise transact the business of the country with safety; and in their name and on their behalf I respectfully and very earnestly insist that the Government shall establish a policy which will give stability to interest rates, prevent these violent fluctuations, and lead to lower interest rates.

Will the question be asked, How can it be done? I venture to answer:

First. That the influence of the Comptroller of the Currency and of the Federal Reserve Board be exerted to require a limitation upon loans made by member banks or banks engaged in interstate commerce, so that only a reasonable percentage of the deposits of such banks shall be permitted to be used for the accommodation of those who are buying stocks for speculative purposes.

Second. That a margin of not less than 25 per cent shall be required in such transactions.

Third. That an interest rate not exceeding 8 per cent shall be permitted in such transactions.

Fourth. That the reserve board shall charge a special rate of interest to those banks who are using the accommodations of the discount privileges with the reserve banks in excess of their rightful proportionate part of such accommodation, so that the normal discount rates of the Federal reserve banks shall not exceed 4 per cent, but the special rate for banks desiring to use more than their rightful proportion of the reserves with the reserve banks shall be at a progressively higher rate. In this way banks that put up Liberty bonds for the purpose of getting more than their proportionate part and lending this money out on very high rates of interest will find it less profitable to engage in such a policy.

The discount rates of the Federal reserve bank of Richmond, for example, effective January 23, 1920, included the following:

	15 days and under.	16 to 90 days.	91 days to 6 months.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Member banks:
Secured by United States certificate of debt	4¼	.....	.....
Secured by Liberty bonds	5½	.....	.....
Secured by eligible paper	6	.....	.....
Secured by War Finance Corporation bonds	7	.....	.....
Rediscounts:
Customers' notes—
Secured by United States certificates of debt	4¼	4¾	.....
Secured by Liberty bonds	5½	5½	.....
Secured by War Finance Corporation bonds	7	7	.....
Trade acceptances	6	6	.....
Commercial paper	6	6	.....
Agricultural or live-stock paper	6	6	6

You will observe from these discount rates that eligible paper—that is, the notes of manufacturers, merchants, and business men engaged in production and distribution—would be compelled to pay around 8 per cent if the member bank is permitted any margin over and above what they themselves have to pay the reserve bank. This is true even on trade acceptances, which in London have a rate of 3½ per cent. In other words, our manufacturers, merchants, and business men engaged in production and distribution are compelled to pay by this policy twice as much as they do in London, charging the interest, of course, upon the cost of the goods, and thus raising the cost of living. Against this policy I enter my resolute and solemn protest.

I heartily approve the evident purpose of the Federal Reserve Board to reduce the excessive speculative loans on the stock market and divert such credits to the benefit of commerce; but this can be accomplished without raising the rate of interest by requiring larger collateral margins and by limiting stock collateral loans to a reasonable part of the reserves of the member banks, and all loans to a proportionate part of the reserves with the Federal reserve banks.

LIBERTY LOAN AND VICTORY LOAN BONDS.

When the American people were engaged in the war the Treasury Department organized Liberty and Victory loan drives, and every citizen was urged to buy these bonds; if necessary, to sell his property and buy the bonds; to borrow money and buy the bonds. The bonds were sold at par. It was a patriotic duty to buy the bonds, but the high rates of interest which have resulted from the unrestrained speculation on the stock exchange, and the high rates of interest which the reserve banks have established, have had the effect of having these bonds appear as a poor investment, and these bonds have shrunk so that in the case of the bonds which have not the nontaxable feature they have fallen off in value almost 10 per cent, inducing many persons who are poor and who borrowed money to carry these bonds to sell them at a loss, and many more will be induced to sell them at a loss, contrary to a wise and just public policy.

If the normal discount rate of the Federal reserve banks were put at 4 per cent and the banks were discouraged from abusing the privileges of the reserve banks for stock-speculative purposes in the manner which I have pointed out, these bonds would come back to par, and they should be brought back to par. The people who bought these bonds ought not to suffer a loss, and the credit of the United States ought to be preserved by the policy which I have taken the liberty to suggest to you and to your administration.

The result of these speculative stock loans has been such that the New York Federal reserve bank has had its reserve very seriously impaired, so that the New York reserve bank has been borrowing money on a large scale from other reserve banks who do not suffer from this strain.

There is no adequate reason why the rates of the reserve banks should not be uniform; why they ought to be higher in one part of the country and lower in another part of the country. The loans are as reliable in one part of the country as in another, and every part of the country is entitled to a uniform rate.

The high cost of living demands for its solution stability in interest rates in order to encourage production and distribution, and to reduce the high cost of living demands a moderate rate of interest.

The Federal reserve banks were not established as money-making institutions, but for the purpose of giving stability and a reasonable stable interest to the productive enterprises of the Nation.

The Federal reserve banks last year made a profit of about 100 per cent of their capital, but this in no way measures the added expense on the cost of living, because the high rate of interest charged by the Federal reserve banks is reflected upon loans and discounts of other banks, running into the billions, since it affects the interest rates in all parts of the country.

I regard this matter as a matter of national importance, and I would not feel that I had discharged my duty to the country if I had failed to call your attention to it in these explicit terms.

Yours, very respectfully,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. McKELLAR. I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a resolution which comes over from a preceding day?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a resolution that comes over, submitted by me on the 13th instant.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 305) submitted by Mr. McKELLAR on the 13th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, requested to defer the selling of the vessels taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the war until further action by Congress.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move to table the resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, just a moment. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that it would be better to refer the resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PITTMAN. The object of my motion is to stop debate, because it is practically the same resolution that has just been offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], which was debated quite fully, and it is the only way to stop debate on the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator withhold the motion until I can make a statement in reference to the resolution?

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well; I will withdraw my motion and move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have only a few words to say in reference to the resolution. It is not designed as a reflection upon the Shipping Board, but is a mere expression of view on the part of the Senate as to what should be done at this particular juncture with our ships.

It is a very serious matter. The Shipping Board is preparing to receive bids to-day. We do not know what contractual relations might be involved in the matter, and I think out of an abundance of caution the Senate ought not to hesitate for a moment to see to it that no sale is consummated, either in whole or in part, as to any of these ships.

The adoption of this resolution will simply mean that no sale will be consummated, and it will be established beyond the peradventure of a doubt what I think every Senator here, even the chairman of the committee, feels, that there ought not to be a sale under the circumstances. If he had not thought so, he would not have asked the chairman of the Shipping Board not to sell the ships until he had at least consulted with his committee.

I heard the testimony of Mr. Payne, and as I understood it it was somewhat vague and indefinite. At all events he is proceeding with the reception of bids. He is going along just as if he intended to carry out the sale. It is perfectly apparent from his testimony that he believes that the sale at this price ought to go through.

So far as I am concerned, I do not believe the sale ought to go through at any price. We have spent years in building up the merchant marine which we have, and these German ships will be an important adjunct to our merchant marine. I do not believe the American people are in favor of disposing of the ships in this way.

It is said that the ships are going to be sailed under the American flag. How can anyone guarantee that—the Shipping Board or anyone else? If one of the ships is sold to me, for instance, to-day, what power is there to prevent me from selling it to a foreign corporation? The truth of the business is unless we act the rights of the American people in this fleet of German ships are likely to be jeopardized, and I think we ought to act to-day.

I hope we may have a record vote on the question, and if there is nothing else to be said on the resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think that the extent to which the chairman of the Committee on Commerce goes in his assurance to the Senate is that the Shipping Board are willing to postpone the sale of these vessels until the committee has heard something further with regard to the matter, and that is as far as the assurance to the Senate goes.

I am opposed to the sale of these ships or of any other ships belonging to the United States. The people of the United States have expended hundreds and thousands of millions of dollars in building up the merchant marine, and I do not believe it ought to be disposed of to private persons. I think the United States ought to retain not only the German ships, but all other ships which have been built at public expense, and that the United States should operate them. I think it is only fair that the Senate should be permitted an opportunity to express itself upon the resolution.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator contend that this resolution commits the Senate to the policy of governmental ownership? There are many of us who otherwise might vote for it who will vote against it if that be the case. I hope the Senator does not construe the resolution as meaning that it is an indorsement of the governmental ownership and operation of ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Oklahoma will yield to me, I desire to say that merely a glance at the resolution shows that it does not mean anything of that kind.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, all of the argument that has been presented in favor of action of this sort is based upon the proposition that the Government should continue the ownership and the operation of these vessels. So far as that is concerned, I do not feel that that is involved in the matter. I think that is a policy that will be determined later on by the Senate.

In view of the statement that I have made to the Senate, and the assurances that I have given to it, as to what the chairman of the Shipping Board has assured the Committee on Commerce, I am satisfied that the resolution will amount to nothing; that is, that the result will be just the same, whether the resolution is passed or not passed. If the other side of the Chamber have so little confidence in their representative, the chairman of the Shipping Board, as to feel, after the assurances he has given to the Committee on Commerce, which have been transmitted to the Senate, that the board will not perfect this sale until the whole matter has been submitted to the Senate Committee on Commerce, and that committee shall act, and that if the committee itself says that they shall not go on and perfect the sale they will not do it, or if the Senate passes a resolution to that effect after the facts have all been presented they will not do it—if in the face of all those things the other side of the Chamber has not any more confidence in the chairman of their Shipping Board than to think he will go on, contrary to those assurances, I shall make no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington will not include this entire side of the Chamber in his animadversions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not yet heard any Senator on the other side of the Chamber defending the chairman of the Shipping Board or assuring the Senate that they believe that they can depend upon his assurance.

Mr. THOMAS. It has not been necessary that we on this side of the Chamber should do so. The chairman of the committee has so ably performed that task that it has relieved us of the necessity of saying anything in reference to the matter. I beg to assure the Senator from Washington that I am in hearty accord with the position which he occupies on the subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am satisfied the Senator from Colorado feels that way, and I am sure there are many other Senators on the other side of the Chamber who also occupy the same position. I am sorry that there is any suggestion that there is any partisanship in the matter, for I have not looked at it in that way.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, while it is probable that the Senate has heretofore been recreant in the performance of its duty in dealing with the question of what disposition shall be made of the ships which are held by the Shipping Board, I am not in favor of the Senate continuing to remain silent on the question. I therefore hope that the resolution which has been presented by the Senator from Tennessee will be adopted.

I do not think that the resolution really carries any reflection upon the chairman of the Shipping Board. It is apparent that the chairman of the Shipping Board, and probably those who are associated with him, entertain the idea that these ships should be disposed of. So far as I am concerned—and I hope that a majority of the Senate entertain the same view—I do not believe that the ships which were captured or turned over from the Imperial German Government should be disposed of, nor that the other ships held by the Shipping Board should be sold.

Unfortunately for our country, prior to the recent war, whatever prestige, if any of any consequence, we had had in the early days of the country in the way of maintaining a merchant marine had been lost; there were but very few vessels that were sailing under the American flag. Now, through the fortunes of war, we may say, the United States has come into possession of an immense fleet of vessels; we are now in an advantageous position to establish a great merchant marine, such as will be of vast benefit and advantage to our country. Are we going to fritter away this opportunity? Are we going to allow our vessels to be disposed of to private interests, with the possibility, if not the probability, of those vessels in the course of time getting into the hands of foreign owners? I do not believe that we should adopt a policy of that character.

What if the vessels are sold? We have no law under which the Shipping Board can prescribe that the purchasers shall maintain them under the American flag and that they shall continue to be operated, owned, and controlled by American capital. Even if such provisions should be placed in the contract, would they be valid—would they be binding upon the purchasers? I dare say that they would not be, unless there was a law passed upon the subject. If the ships are sold before a law is passed upon the subject prescribing those restrictions or those requirements, would not a clause of that character, if placed in the contract of sale, be absolutely of no effect and be null and void?

Under the circumstances, I think if a majority of the Senate are opposed to a sale of the vessels we should so express ourselves, just as the chairman of the Shipping Board and his associate members have expressed themselves as being in favor of selling the ships. Therefore I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

[Mr. ASHURST addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I had really about concluded my remarks. I am supporting the resolution and hope that it will be adopted. I do not consider that it is any reflection upon the chairman of the Shipping Board, and if he considers it a reflection, it is merely due to a little oversensitiveness on his part. It is no more of a reflection upon him than it is a reflection upon Congress for the chairman of the Shipping Board to take up the matter of negotiating the sale of this fleet of vessels without consulting with Congress as to whether or not he should do so. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I desire to interrupt him by reading from the record excerpts from what Mr. Payne says about this matter, which I think are pertinent. I hope the Senate will listen to them. Mr. Payne says:

> On the contrary, Senator, as I thought I had made perfectly plain, the board passed a resolution that they would authorize the sales division to go forward with these sales, subject to the approval of the board after the offer had been made, as to each individual ship. In other words, if, when these bids are obtained—

And they are going to be obtained to-day, and are already before him by this time—> the board is of the opinion that the price is inadequate, either as a whole or as to individual ships, the board has expressly reserved to itself the right and the duty of determining that question and rejecting the bids.

He testified in another part of his testimony that he regarded the price of $28,000,000 as adequate, and gives his reasons why, and the only reservation he says the board has made in connection with the sale of these ships is the reservation as to price.

Mr. President, further interrupting, I beg leave to read from page 2327 of Mr. Payne's testimony:

> I have not thought it wise to do so. As a matter of fact, we have been watching these hearings here with great interest.

Meaning the hearings in the Commerce Committee—

> Perhaps as a principle, if I could state one, it would be this: Assuming that we are correct in the conviction that these ships ought to be sold, we ought to be willing to sell them for slightly less than it would cost to build them plus the difference between the spot delivery and the future delivery, which would be involved in the building of the ship.

Again, on page 2331, Mr. Payne says:

> Well, now, let us assume that is true. Then, the board confronts this situation: We are compelled to sell the ships or to go forward with our reconditioning program, at anywhere from $57,000,000 to $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 cost to the program, with the certain knowledge that we can not get these ships into service sooner than from 6 to 12 months; that meantime, besides the cost of reconditioning, we have a large expense in taking care of the ships, manning them, because you can not leave a ship alone tied to the dock; you have to take care of it—now, you have either got to sell the ships now—

The chairman of the Shipping Board talks about it and says "you have either got to sell the ships now"— > or you have got to let them lie in the water at a large expense, or you have got to go forward with this enormous expenditure to recondition them.

>
> In other words, we confront a condition; and even if we are not able to get what we ought to get, are we any better off if we add this large expenditure and postpone the date of sale until tonnage comes in from England and the other countries, where it is now scarce? That will depreciate the value of our ships, and the worst thing in the world for a ship almost is to have it lie idle in the docks.
> So the question is not primarily whether we could get all the ships are worth. The question is what we are to do in view of the facts which confront us. Shall we spend this money, which we will never get back, or shall we sell the ships to private people, who can operate them, they believe, successfully and establish the routes?

I desire to read one other excerpt, and then I am through. I read from page 2338:

> Senator McNARY. Let me ask you, Judge Payne, is there any time limit for the acceptance of these bids?
> Mr. PAYNE. No. Of course, we would be required, in good faith, to act promptly.

Now, Senators, you see what is going through the mind of the chairman of the Shipping Board. He is receiving bids at this good hour. He says that the ships ought to be sold; he says that the price which has been offered is fair and adequate; and he says that the question of price is the only question that the board reserves to itself, and that promptness ought to characterize the board's action in this matter. He seemed to resent that a committee of the Senate or that the Senate should take any part in it. I for one believe that the Senate ought to prohibit the sale of these ships.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, from the attitude expressed in the testimony read by the Senator from Tennessee I see all the more reason why the Senate should act and act promptly in this matter. It occurs to me from that testimony that the chairman of the Shipping Board is rather pessimistic as to the value of these ships; he is rather pessimistic as to the opportunities of the Government to continue their ownership and to operate them in such a way as to make them profitable to the Government. As a rule, when you see a person who is proposing to sell something and he has not very much faith in his own property he is not in a very good attitude to get the best price. He is a poor salesman. Certainly at a casual glance——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator will permit me a moment, I should like to conclude, and then I will yield the floor——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask the Senator if the Government could not get any more than Judge Payne estimates for the ships would the Senator favor the Government retaining them and operating them permanently?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I most assuredly would. I think if the private corporations of this country can take these ships and arrange for their reconditioning and hold them until the trade can be established, the Government certainly can do so, and the Government should not sacrifice them. Why, in yesterday's papers there appeared a statement from a naval architect who was connected with the Government during the war and made plans for some of the largest ships which were constructed, in which he stated that he would estimate that the value of this German fleet was at least $215,000,000, and that if we were going out to reconstruct it it would cost at least $275,000,000; and yet we talk about selling it for $28,000,000.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I merely wanted to emphasize what the Senator was saying by calling his attention to the enormous profit made by the International Mercantile Marine on their fleet, and that there is no justification for the Government losing any money in operating these ships. They made a profit of 150 per cent, I believe.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I see no reason for the Government making the sacrifice that appears to be impending in this transaction. Therefore I hope the Senate will express itself in opposition to it. I believe that the best way for the Government to establish and maintain a merchant marine is for the Government to hold its present fleet and to make provision for its operation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just a word in that connection.

I am no new convert to this idea of being opposed to the Shipping Board disposing of these merchant vessels. Last June I introduced a resolution to the effect that the sense of the Senate was that only such ships should be sold by the Shipping Board as were inefficient and could not be profitably operated, and were too small for overseas trade, and so forth, and that all the other ships should be retained for the present. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce. I began, in magazine articles and public addresses and here on the floor of the Senate, to urge the slogan throughout the country, "Don't give up the ships." That has been my position ever since.

The Commerce Committee has been investigating that matter. There are before the Commerce Committee bills and resolutions, among others the one introduced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] last Friday, I think, and immediately referred to the Commerce Committee. That committee on the afternoon of the same day called before it the chairman of the Shipping Board for a discussion of the program they had in mind and to ascertain whether it was important at once to act upon that resolution. Now, all of a sudden, this great outburst of enthusiasm, calling for immediate action by the Senate, seems to me to be rather uncalled for, in that the Commerce Committee has been assured by the chairman of the Shipping Board that this so-called auction simply means that they are to receive bids for these ships. He assures the Commerce Committee that he will report to that committee precisely what these bids are, in detail, and that not a single bid will be accepted unless it meets the approval of the committee; or, if the committee sees fit to refer it back to the Senate, the Senate itself can act, as it should; so that there is no danger of closing a sale for any of these ships under the present circumstances.

Mr. MCKELLAR and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have a copy of Judge Payne's testimony, which I shall be delighted to turn over to the Senator and have him point out where any such agreement as that was made by Judge Payne. Several members of the committee made that statement, but Judge Payne, as I read his testimony, neither said "yes" nor "no" about it. He said that the only reservation the board had about these bids was a reservation as to price, and he had told the committee a number of times that the price of $28,000,000 was entirely satisfactory to him, and he wanted to sell them and he expected to sell them.

I offer the testimony to the Senator, if he would like to point it out.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. One minute in that connection. I have not seen the stenographic report of Judge Payne's testimony, but I was present when he made the statement to the committee, and I know that he assured the committee in as clear a manner as it could be expressed that this so-called auction did not mean that a sale would be made at all, but that it was simply a means of getting the best bids possible for these ships, and that the result of the bidding would be laid before the committee, and that the board would not under any circumstances close any transaction until the matter had been submitted to the committee. Now, that is thoroughly understood. I call upon the chairman and other members of the committee to verify that. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], here at my left, was also present. They can verify that statement, if they see fit to do so, or question it; but that is the understanding of the committee.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I gladly verify the statement made by the Senator from Florida. I was present and helped cross-question Judge Payne myself, and he stated most unequivocally that no action would be taken toward selling the ships until the matter had been investigated in great detail by the board and referred to the Commerce Committee for its advice.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming, as I do, that all the Senator from Florida has said and all the Senator from Louisiana has said is absolutely true, still do not the Senators think that the Senate as well as the committee—which the Senator will not even claim has the same power that the Senate itself has—that the Senate itself has a right to express itself? Mr. Payne has not said that he would wait for the Senate or the Congress to act, but that he would refer the matter to the committee. This resolution simply calls for an expression of the sentiment of the Senate. Why does not the Senator let us vote, and let the Senate express itself, as well as its committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am perfectly willing for the Senate to vote. I never have in any way objected to that; but I think the Senate ought to have before it the facts upon which it could base a clear judgment. The Senate usually votes in these matters on the report of a committee. I am perfectly willing that the committee should not take the responsibility of determining this question one way or the other, but should refer it to the Senate upon a report of all the facts.

Mr. NORRIS. But we have no assurance of that. Mr. Payne has not assured us that he will wait for Congress to act, but he has said that he will refer it to the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no doubt he would prefer to have the Congress act rather than a committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, let us act.

Mr. FLETCHER. But he said he would not even ask for an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate if the committee felt that this sale ought not to go through; that that would end it. It was simply a means of getting the matter concluded without any delay whatever; so that it is not necessary to have it come back to the Senate if the committee is of the opinion that the sale ought not to be made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose the committee is of the opinion that the sale ought to be made, then what?

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the committee will report it to the Senate, I take it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then there can be no objection to the passage of a resolution deferring the sale until Congress decides for itself.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the resolution ought to go to the committee, and the committee will make its report upon the resolution after full information on the subject has been had. We are not at present precisely informed as to all of the details in connection with this whole matter; and I think it is proper, I think it is due the Shipping Board, I think it is due the public generally, that these facts should be developed before the committee, and that the committee should be allowed to make its report to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am anxious to go to other business, but, as this matter has been presented, I wish to say just a few words in regard to it.

I am utterly against the Government ownership of ships. I think the building of new ships at $225 a ton by the Shipping Board ought to be stopped, and stopped now, and I should be glad to see the ships that we have sold at proper prices. I do not understand that this resolution commits us to Government ownership. If I did, I should not think of voting for it; but I do think we are entitled to know something about a very extraordinary transaction, as it appears on its face.

These vessels are not of the Imperator class, to which the Senator from Arizona has referred. Those are included under the treaty. These are vessels which belong to us and are not covered by the treaty—this fleet of 330,000 tons. They are entirely different from the Imperator class of ships, to which the Senator from Arizona referred. But, Mr. President, it is proposed to sell them apparently at a very low price, and I think the Shipping Board ought to defer action until we can find out something about them.

It appears from the reports in the newspapers that the Shipping Board proposes to take action. I should like to know the facts about these ships, their value, and the money necessary to be expended to put them into operation. I should like to know also—and I think it is very important to know—whether the President has made any committals in regard to these ships that took refuge in our ports and were interned here. There may be some committal abroad in regard to their disposition, and I should like to know whether there is or not, because if a committal has been made by the President abroad, of course that might well tie our hands.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is no reflection on anybody to ask that the sale be deferred until we know what the facts are. I have read this resolution. I can not see that it commits us to Government ownership, to which I am totally opposed; but I think we are entitled to the information.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with those who are opposing the sale of the ships for all the reasons which have been stated; but there is another reason, too, why I think we should delay action. We will know shortly whether we are to have an international Government or not, and perhaps then it will not be necessary to raise any trouble about selling the ships to an international corporation. Undoubtedly the international government will distribute these ships equitably among all the countries, and as we enter upon the supergovernment which we are soon to have it may be found wise to transfer the ships to the international government, and let the international government operate them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a day or two ago a resolution similar to that now pending was under consideration here on the floor of the Senate. It was introduced because it had been made public, and afterwards the chairman of the Shipping Board said that it had been public for a long time, by advertisement, that the board had decided to sell these ships. The resolution was introduced to request them to defer the sale until Congress could decide whether the property of the Government, existing in that form and to that extent, ought to be sold or not. There was no intention to reflect upon anybody. There is no such intention, I am quite sure. I for one have the highest respect for Judge Payne, both as to his character and as to his legal ability, and for other members of the Shipping Board. That fact, however, does not in my mind operate as a compelling motive for Congress to abandon its functions.

I am not in favor of the Government ownership and operation of ships as an industry. That question, however, is not now pending. The question is, Shall Congress be given an opportunity to decide what shall be done with these ships? A resolution to give Congress that opportunity was pending, and upon objection of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, it went over. Meantime Judge Payne appeared before the Committee on Commerce and gave his testimony, and from it I should judge that he will not accept the bids that are now being received at this hour, or any of them, until some sort of a conference is had by him with the Committee on Commerce, or until he has submitted the bids to the Committee on Commerce. All of this is very proper, of course, and I am glad that even that much was promised; but when Congress is considering a matter perfectly proper for us to consider as the trustees of the public—to wit, the disposition of a great block of Government property—I see no reason why we should be interrupted in our contemplated action because the chairman of the Shipping Board walks over here and says, "I intend to go right ahead with this auction, irrespective of Congress, only, after I have got the bids, I will then notify the Committee on Commerce what they are."

That is not the way for Congress to transact its business. Our business is to express our opinion, which is no reflection whatever upon the Shipping Board. Judge Payne does not say in his testimony, as I understand, what he is going to do after he has submitted the result of these bids to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whether he is bound to go ahead with the sale then, or whether the President has approved of his policy in going ahead with the sale without consulting Congress. He says none of those things. He simply says he will submit the result of the bidding to the Committee on Commerce.

I have the highest respect for the Committee on Commerce. I do not for a minute mean to intimate that they will do anything or recommend anything that they do not think is for the best interests of the country; but, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] says, the Committee on Commerce, or a mere majority of it, is not the voice of Congress; it is the instrument of Congress to consider testimony and make recommendations for action.

All that is utterly irrelevant to the purpose of the resolution, which is an expression by the Senate that the board defer its contemplated sale until Congress has an opportunity to express its opinion in the premises. Nothing could be more proper, more polite, or more wise in my opinion. I for one do not feel like deferring again the proper business of Congress because the chairman of the Shipping Board has made some promise which to my mind does not go far enough and does not make sure that the interests of the country will be protected.

Mr. KIRBY obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut one question before the Senator from Arkansas proceeds?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Connecticut says he is utterly opposed to Government ownership and operation of ships. The Government has these ships. The Senator does not expect to see them tied up to the dock. We must do something with them. If he is opposed to the Government having anything to do with them, now is a mighty good time for the Government to get out of the business. I think he will agree with that. The opportunities for sale are perhaps as good now as we will ever have. Does not the Senator agree to that? Does the Senator mean to say that he is opposed to Government operation of the ships at all or only for the present? Of course, it looks to me as if the position is a little bit inconsistent. If the Senator is utterly opposed to Government ownership and operation, then the Senator must, on the other hand, say that we ought to sell the ships, it seems to me, and if he says we ought to sell them, of course now is a good time to sell them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Arkansas be kind enough to allow me to answer the series of questions propounded by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will state briefly that when I say I am utterly opposed to Government ownership and operation of ships I mean as a continuous, permanent business and policy, because it is the entering of the Government upon business, and I do not think in this form of Government it was intended to set the Government up as a competitor of its own citizens in the transaction of ordinary business.

At present I am opposed to the Government ownership and operation of railroads for the same reason. I am opposed to Government operation of grocery stores, and wheat farms, and cotton fields, and so forth, unless the people of the country want to go out of business and have a socialistic form of Government and have the Government take over the business of its citizens. But the world moves, and while I am opposed to that personally now, the day may come when I might change my mind. I do not think I can change my mind upon that subject. Nevertheless, that is not the question here.

I agree with the Senator that it may be desirable for the Government at the present time, which is just succeeding the great World War, to operate these ships in the performance of some of its legitimate functions. I have been informed that the Secretary of War wanted to operate some of the ships in connection with the War Department as transports and one thing and another, and it may be the Government could find various uses for them. But I say this debate shows that the whole subject has not been half investigated, and if the War Department thinks one thing and the Chief Executive thinks another and various departments have other views upon this great question it seems to me that it is the part of policy and prudence and wise statesmanship, and even common, ordinary business prudence, not to do anything until Congress decides what should be done. But the proposition of the board, if they had not been stayed, was to plunge in and part with the property. When parted with there is nothing for us to consider. I say let us stay their hand by act of Congress, and then consider, my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and all of us, what the Congress wants to do by a majority vote, not what my opinion is or what his opinion is. Mine is subject to change, as is his, I presume, upon proper evidence and conviction. The thing to do is to preserve the status quo or else we will not have anything to consider.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the condition here is rather anomalous, it seems to me, and I have been decidedly surprised at the conduct of some of the Members on our side of the Chamber. The Democratic Members of the Senate have so criticized the administration in the conduct of the war as that the people of the country have a wrong conception of the great accomplishment of our country in the war. Some of them will not even know that we won the war when they listen to the snarling and yapping of the British press.

Here is the condition to-day. I believe we ought to have an American merchant marine, that it ought to be established and maintained, and that all the ships built and owned by the Government should be operated by the Government in the carrying of our coastwise and foreign commerce. That is my position with reference to the American merchant marine. We have the ships here already built; we have the ships that we have gotten from the German Government; and we ought to determine the policy, to determine what our Government expects to do. We have not done that.

Then the Shipping Board is here, and it has certain functions to perform. The Shipping Board has authority, it claims, to sell the vessels, and it says it is proceeding under the law with the sale of these vessels; that it is proceeding in accordance with good business judgment in the sale of the vessels.

But after this question was raised the chairman of the Shipping Board went to our Committee on Commerce, of which I, too, am a member, and stated:

> We do not propose to sell or dispose of the ships now, but we only intend to take these bids. We will bring the whole matter here to you and no further action will be taken and the sale will not be consummated until you have submitted it to Congress, if necessary, and obtained the views of the Congress upon the question.

That is what has been assured to all of you by the chairman of the Commerce Committee and by four or five other members of the committee, and that is what will be done.

But we might go further. The resolution does not prohibit or prevent the sale of the ships. The resolution says that the Shipping Board—> is hereby requested to defer the selling of the vessels taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the war until further action by Congress.

That is only a request. It confers no authority and has no binding effect upon the Shipping Board. The Shipping Board is an agency of the present Democratic administration or of the Government, and it is under direction of the chairman of the Shipping Board, who, I think, is a capable man. I think the chairman of the Shipping Board should remain chairman of the board until the policy of the Government is determined with reference to establishment of the merchant marine, and he should not quit his post nor take any other service until that is determined. He is acquainted with the conditions, and the Government ought to be entitled to his services here until it has settled this very important question.

So far as I am concerned, I am going to vote for the resolution, although I had not expected to do so. The chairman of the committee, who is an able man and has the Government's interests at heart perhaps as much as any other man here, is on the other side of the question. He has stated that he has confidence in this agency, this Shipping Board, and in this man, its chairman, and that the board will do the things he has agreed to do. But our own membership have not confidence, it seems to me, and so far as I am concerned I am going to vote for the resolution. It will effect nothing more when passed than has already been agreed to be done by the chairman of the Shipping Board relative to delaying the sale of the ships until the Commerce Committee and the Senate can have opportunity to decide what should be done about it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think there is a general unanimity of sentiment in the Chamber in regard to the unwisdom of a speedy, ill-considered sale of these vessels, and if I thought for a moment that they would be thus disposed of I should be among the first not to vote for a Senate resolution upon the subject but for a bill dealing with it in statutory form. The situation, however, to my mind is one which does not require this precipitate action, which, whatever the intention of the introducer of the resolution may be, does, in my judgment, directly reflect upon the Shipping Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to say, as the author of the resolution, that there is nothing on earth in the resolution that could possibly be construed as a reflection upon the Shipping Board, and that that was not the purpose in introducing it—neither the language nor the purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. I stated that such was not the intention, but I reiterate that it will receive that construction, whatever the intention of the resolution may be. I say that because of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who has given the Senate the substance of the understanding existing between that committee and the chairman of the Shipping Board.

The probabilities are that the bids which were called for are, while we discuss this resolution, being opened and tabulated. I do not know that that is the case, but I assume that the work is now going on. In view of the assurance of Mr. Payne that no step will be taken toward the consummation of the sale, no matter what the bids may be, and that the whole subject will be submitted to the consideration of the Committee on Commerce, which is a servant of the Senate, and that the opinion and view of that committee will be taken before any action is had, which presupposes its report to the Senate and our action here, and inasmuch as that statement has been emphasized by the indorsement of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], I draw the conclusion that necessarily the public will regard the resolution as exhibiting a lack of confidence in the integrity of the word of the chairman of the Shipping Board. I think, therefore, that the resolution might well go over until to-morrow. If it be true that bids are now being opened, then, of course, it is too late, so far as the bids are concerned, for the resolution to become operative.

Mr. President, we must remember that a few days ago a very prominent newspaper proprietor in the United States, who has long had the welfare and well-being of the people of America politically, socially, economically, and religiously in his keeping, has applied to the courts for an injunction against the United States of America, forbidding the Government to make disposition of the property. Inasmuch as the courts have been appealed to, perhaps we could without any greater danger of injury to the country let the matter go over until the courts shall determine, at the suit of the gentleman to whom I have alluded, whether the Government of the United States shall make sale of the ships.

There are some other things that ought to be considered before a final determination of the operation of the ships either by the Government or otherwise shall be reached. I recall that among the other reasons assigned for the inability of the Government to commercially operate these ships is the effect of prohibition upon the lines. It has been stated here, and I have no doubt there is a good deal in it, that the ships as dry ships, if I may use that expression with reference to a ship which sails on the water, can not compete with the ships of foreign countries as wet ships. My experience in the world teaches me that, humorous as the conclusion may sound, there is a good deal in it. I might apply the argumentum ad hominem. I have no doubt if my friend the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] or my distinguished friend the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES of Washington] intended an ocean voyage that the dry ship would receive their patronage, but with reference to every other Senator in this body I am inclined to think that under the same circumstances their patriotism would yield to their appetite. What is true of the Senate is in all probability true of the most of mankind—Americans particularly. If they can not get something to drink on land, very naturally they want to get something to drink on the sea, and the business of the wet lines will be promoted in proportion as the dryness of the great American public shall increase.

So the oasis in the great American Sahara may be punctuated by a resort to these foreign bottoms and a surcease of sorrow obtained in the good things of life which they will offer to an unhappy nation.

We ought, therefore, before determining whether there shall be Government operation of these ships, to ascertain the extent to which this unfortunate economic dilemma may have subjected such an experiment.

There are other reasons. Some weeks ago I read in one of the New York papers an account of the difficulty which American companies experience in securing American seamen for the operation of their competitive lines, and these difficulties arose from many sources, not the least of which was the prevailing rate of wages in all the various land industries of the country; and still another, the contrast between the comforts and conveniences of life as afforded in other pursuits with those afforded ordinary seamen in the very best American ships. The institution and the successful operation of a merchant marine, however great the national resources behind it may be, are not free from many serious difficulties which may spell all the difference between success and disaster, and these ought to be subjected to the experiences of men who know all about mercantile marine affairs and who can cooperate with the Government in finding a happy solution.

Mr. President, I hope, therefore, that the resolution will not be adopted, at least not to-day. The fact that there is no emergency requiring it; that the Shipping Board will in all probability proceed to-day in the even tenor of its way; the fact that we have the word of the Shipping Board, which I regard and always will regard as perfectly good until the contrary appears, to my mind makes the consideration of the resolution at this time largely a waste of the valuable time of the Senate. If it be in order, I shall ask that the resolution go over under the rules until to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am utterly opposed to the sale of these ships at this time. A few days ago I expressed to the Senate somewhat fully the reasons for my opposition to the proposed action of the Shipping Board and I shall not repeat them to-day.

I have simply risen for the purpose of saying that I was very much disappointed at the attitude of the chairman of the Shipping Board taken a few hours after the Senate had had under discussion the resolution to stay, temporarily at least, the sale of the ships. I supposed when it was brought to the attention of the chairman of that board that the Senate, one branch of the Congress, was considering a resolution with respect to the sale of the ships, he would say at once that of course if the Senate is considering the question of the policy of the sale of the ships, the Shipping Board will not proceed with the matter until the Senate can have an opportunity to express itself with regard to that matter.

But he did not take that position. On the contrary, he made it perfectly clear to the committee that it was the purpose of the board to go on with the negotiations and the proceedings looking to a sale. He made it perfectly clear that in his judgment, at least, the sum which they would probably be offered in the bids invited would be satisfactory, and a price at which the ships ought to be sold. He made it perfectly plain that it was not only his opinion but the opinion of every member of the Shipping Board, with the exception of one member whose mind he said was still open, that as a matter of policy not only these ships but the ships that had been constructed by the Government and are now owned by the Government should be sold. He made it perfectly clear it was the purpose of the Shipping Board, unless it was stopped either by injunction or by the action of Congress, to proceed to carry out that policy.

Mr. President, Congress has not yet made up its mind, or if it has made up its mind, it has given no declaration of its purpose, speaking for the Government, to dispose of these ships. The question of whether it is good public policy for the Government to own and operate the merchant marine which it is now constructing and establishing is a question which has not been settled and upon which, probably, many Senators and many Members of the House of Representatives have not made up their minds. I think it is the general feeling that until we who are authorized to speak for the Government in this behalf have made up our minds and have given declaration of our purpose in this regard a subordinate agency of the Government ought not to proceed in a way that may effectually frustrate and defeat, in part at least, that purpose when we ultimately declare it. It seems to me that the Shipping Board rather shows a disposition to arrogate to itself the settlement of this policy, and that it may do so unless Congress shall act in the premises.

Mr. President, if Congress is the final authority in this matter, why should there be any proceeding looking to the disposition of the ships that we have constructed and to which we have acquired title until Congress has acted? Why should the Shipping Board, an agency of the Congress, feel that it is reflected upon when Congress says to it, "We have not made up our minds as to the policy which you show a disposition to pursue, and we desire you to withhold any further proceedings of any kind or character with reference to that matter until we have had time to consider, deliberate, and act"?

So far from the Shipping Board regarding that as a reflection, I should think, under ordinary circumstances, the members of the board when put upon notice that the Congress contemplated action in the premises would regard that not only as an instruction to them but as a warning to them, and that they would be very glad to know, before they do act, what is the attitude of Congress with reference to the matter. It is idle to say that the sale of these 30 great ships, with a tonnage of 368,000, would not materially interfere with the establishment of a policy of Government ownership of the merchant marine that it is now building; it is idle to say if this board is allowed to take this action in this way, and if Congress ultimately decides on another policy, that the policy will not be interfered with and crippled by such action.

Mr. President, I can see no reason under the sun why Congress should not make this declaration. I do not assume, in view of what Judge Payne stated to the committee, that he will finally close the proposed sales until he refers the matter of the bids to the Commerce Committee, and I assume, if the Commerce Committee shall decide against this policy, that probably the board will halt and await its advice; but, Mr. President, this is a matter of great public concern; it is not a small matter; it is a matter involving the policy of the Government with reference to one of the most vital problems that are now under consideration, and it ought not to be decided by a committee of this body, but it ought rather to be decided, in the first instance, by the representatives of the people speaking the will and judgment of the people with reference to the question of whether this Government is to construct and operate an adequate merchant marine or whether it is going to sell to individuals or corporations the ships that it has already built or acquired, to be operated in private ownership and at such prices, which, in the judgment of many, are totally inadequate.

I express myself in this way, stating at the same time that I have great respect and admiration for Judge Payne. I believe he is a man of marked ability, that he is a man of great uprightness of character and of high purpose; but I am amazed, in view of the fact that it has been made plain that the Congress is considering this matter with a view of formulating and declaring a policy with reference to the problems presented, and in the face of the additional fact that there is a common opinion in this country that the price at which it is proposed to sell the ships is a grossly inadequate price, that it should be suggested that the proposed action by the Senate is a reflection upon the Shipping Board and for that reason we should refrain from such action or any action. I think that the board ought not to feel aggrieved if Congress shall say to them politely and courteously, as this resolution does say to them, "We ask that you do not proceed any further in this matter until we have had an opportunity to formulate and declare our policy with respect to it."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it occurs to me that this matter can be adjusted by an amendment of the resolution in such form as will meet general approval and as will defer any sale until the committee has finished its hearings, reported to the Senate, and the Senate has acted upon the report. I therefore propose amending the resolution so that it will read:

That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, requested to defer the selling of the ships taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the war until the subject has been considered by the committee now conducting hearings, reported to and acted upon by the Senate in accordance with the suggestion made by the chairman of the Shipping Board.

Mr. President, in support of that amendment I desire to say that as the chairman of the Shipping Board stated to the committee, as I understand, that he was willing to await an investigation by the committee and the consideration of the matter by the Senate, it seems to me that action such as I propose is a more reasonable postponement than to ask to have the sale postponed until Congress acts. That would imply waiting until new legislation is passed, which is very indefinite and might be forever.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am sure the Senator wants to quote correctly Judge Payne's statement upon that point. I was present when he made his statement, and my recollection about it is—and a member of the committee who was there confirms my recollection—that Judge Payne's statement was only to the effect that he would submit the matter to the committee. He did no agree to wait for the action of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think I shall have the testimony here in a moment; but, whether he stated that or not, he and the board undoubtedly would act if this resolution was passed. It stipulates a definite time, a reasonable time.

I sympathize fully with what has been said as to the unwisdom of selling these ships in this precipitate way, and I believe I can add another reason to the reasons already stated. The bids on these ships, so far as they have been ascertained at all, are very low, alarmingly low, and one reason is said to be fear on the part of purchasers that the Government of the United States is not in a position to give a good title to the vessels. They have never been through any prize court; we hold them simply by main strength; we hold them because Congress passed a resolution to that effect. There is a very widespread opinion among lawyers that such vessels in a port of Europe could be libeled, and that by perfectly peaceful processes the decrees of the court could deprive us of the title. The proposed purchasers are circulating that report, and it is said to be one of the reasons why the bids are so very low.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted to ask the Senator if there is anything in his proposed amendment that would prevent the board from going on and receiving the bids?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Nothing whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because I think that it is of the highest importance for Congress itself, in determining the question finally, to be apprised, approximately at any rate, about what price can be obtained for the ships. I think the board ought to go ahead and get that information, and that it is about one of the most useful things that Congress could have before it when it comes to consider the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator fully, and I understand the information will be secured to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to make a suggestion. I know the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is very anxious to bring another matter before the Senate. I am sorry that this resolution has taken so long. On account of the urgency I am willing to agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, for, even under that amendment, it will certainly stop the sale of the ships until the Senate acts. I hope the Senate will let the matter be voted upon and let the resolution pass.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to express that hope. I want to call up the treaty now. I have been postponing it, but I shall be forced to make the motion to go into open executive session unless we can take a vote on the resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have a vote. I hope we can. The Senator has been very courteous about the matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, for the purpose of facilitating matters, the resolution being now so drawn as to eliminate any possible chance of a construction that will reflect upon Judge Payne, I withdraw my motion to refer to the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to suggest a further amendment to the resolution. The language beginning in line 3 is "the vessels taken by the United States from the Imperial German Government during the war." I am not so clear that that language is quite accurate, and I think we had better follow the resolution under which these vessels were seized and title to them acquired.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. FLETCHER. After the words "United States" to strike out "from the Imperial German Government during the war" and insert "owned in whole or in part by a corporation, citizen, or subject of the Empire of Germany."

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept that amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think it would be unwise to recite as of the present time that they are owned as indicated in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida. The word "formerly" should be inserted, so as to read "formerly owned."

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well; let the word "formerly" be inserted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me if we simply say "is requested not to sell the ships which they are proposing to sell," or "for which they are receiving bids," or "the ships they are proposing to sell at auction," that will cover the whole situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator offer that as an amendment? If so, I will be glad to accept it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest it to the author of the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] completely covers the situation. These vessels, as a matter of fact, were not owned by the Imperial German Government, but by nationals of the German Government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They were ships which were interned here at the outbreak of the war; and in relation to the title to them, as I recall, the opinion was expressed that we had no constitutional right to confiscate them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee accepts my amendment and also accepts the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I now ask, Mr. President, that the resolution as amended may be read to see if it is exactly accurate. I think that can be determined, if the Secretary will read it, and I ask unanimous consent that it be read as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In line 4 it is proposed by Mr. FLETCHER to strike out the words "from the Imperial German Government" and insert "and formerly owned in whole or in part by a corporation, citizen, or subject of the Imperial German Government."

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that there may be added after those words the words "and now proposed to be sold by the Shipping Board."

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not accurate. I suggest that it should read "for which bids are now being taken by the Shipping Board."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Shipping Board denies that it is now proposing to sell them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not understand it in that way; but let it read "for which bids are now being received by the Shipping Board."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Shipping Board will know what is meant.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think that is necessary. That language is broader than it is in the original resolution.

The READING CLERK. Add to the amendment proposed by Mr. FLETCHER the words "for which bids are now being received by the Shipping Board"; and, after the word "until," Mr. HITCHCOCK moves to strike out "further action of Congress" and insert "the subject has been considered by the committee now conducting hearings, reported to and acted upon by the Senate, in accordance with the suggestion made by the chairman of the Shipping Board."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee accepts the various modifications?

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept the various modifications.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD immediately preceding the vote upon the resolution which has just passed the short colloquy between the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and Judge Payne found on page 2310 of the hearings, in which Judge Payne states that the board will be very pleased to defer action if the committee or the Senate so requests by a resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator SIMMONS. Judge, in view of the fact that a resolution is pending before the Senate now requiring the Shipping Board to await an expression from Congress before disposing of these ships, and that resolution will probably be vigorously pressed, would you feel justified in disposing of these ships before action by Congress on that resolution?

Mr. PAYNE. That resolution, I understand, has been referred to this committee. Now, I think this committee should act, and if, in view of the statement which I have now made, the committee thinks we ought not to make that sale and should defer that sale, all the committee has to do is to pass such a request or resolution and it will be cheerfully complied with.

Senator SIMMONS. Or the Senate, either?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, certainly; certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, requested to defer the selling of the vessels taken by the United States and formerly owned in whole or in part by a corporation, citizen, or subject of the Imperial German Government, for which bids are now being received by the Shipping Board, until the subject has been considered by the committee now conducting hearings, reported to and acted upon by the Senate, in accordance with the suggestions made by the chairman of the Shipping Board.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed as in open executive session to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. I now move that the second reading of the treaty be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following proposed amendment to the resolution of ratification of the German peace treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

The United States holds that the principles covered by the letter of the Secretary of State of November 5, 1918, as the conditions upon which the armistice was based are binding and the covenant of the league must be interpreted in accordance with those principles.

Mr. LODGE. I now move, as an amendment to reservation numbered 1, the following change in the reservation reported from the committee in accordance with the instructions of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Amend reservation No. 1 so that it will read as follows:

"1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by the President or by Congress alone whenever a majority of both Houses may deem it necessary."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask that by leave of the Senate, the cable dispatches of which I hold copies in my hand may be published in connection with what I have to say bearing upon the treaty before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WILSON WARNS THE ALLIES—PRESIDENT SERVES IDENTICAL NOTICE ON LONDON, PARIS, AND ROME—VETOES ADRIATIC PLANS—PRESIDENT ALSO OPPOSES THE ALTERNATIVE OF APPLYING THE TREATY OF LONDON—ANGRY COMMENT IN PARIS—PERTINAX DENOUNCES WILSON AS AN AUTOCRAT—LIBERTE TAUNTS HIM WITH FAILURE OF TREATY.

(By Edwin L. James.)

PARIS, February 15.

President Wilson has notified the British, French, and Italian Governments that if they settle the Adriatic problem without the concurrence of Washington the United States will not concern itself further in the settlement of pending European questions. He declares that neither of the proposed solutions is compatible with the American attitude.

This notification was contained in a note handed to the French foreign office late yesterday by Ambassador Wallace, and at the same time handed to the British Government in London and the Italian Government in Rome.

It reached the allied Governments the day after Premiers Lloyd-George and Millerand in London had promised Premier Nitti that before he left the British capital either the compromise plan of January 20 or the treaty of London would be put in force.

FRENCH DIPLOMATS EXCITED.

French diplomats are greatly excited over President Wilson's action. They say that the American Government will not take part in the discussion of the Council of Premiers, to which it is invited, yet at the same time exacts that the premiers' decisions must be shaped in accordance with Washington's wishes.

The French press to-night takes up the question in sensational style, and its comment is bitter.

WILSON'S CRITICISM OF BRITISH PLAN.

The Temps publishes the following semiofficial note:

"The ambassador of the United States yesterday handed to the minister of foreign affairs a memorandum by which the Government of the United States expresses its opinion on the Adriatic problem. The same memorandum was handed yesterday to the British Government in London.

"The Government of the United States criticized the Lloyd-George proposal which was communicated to the Jugo-Slavs by the Supreme Council January 20. Mr. Wilson has examined this project, but he declares that he can not approve the terms of it. He objects particularly to the idea of giving the Jugo-Slavs the choice between this project and the application, pure and simple, of the treaty of London. Besides, the President of the United States finds that the Lloyd-George project differs too much from the memorandum framed in London last December by Premier Lloyd-George and Premier Clemenceau with the collaboration of the American representative.

"President Wilson declares that if the allied powers settle the Adriatic problem without consulting the Government of the United States the latter will find it impossible to continue to concern itself with European affairs.

PREMIERS CONSIDERING THE VOTE.

"The American memorandum was quickly examined by the allied chiefs before M. Millerand left London this morning.

"It is known that the chiefs of the allied Governments had previously handed M. Trumbic, the Jugo-Slav foreign minister in London, a note asking him to request his Government to reply categorically as quickly as possible to the last note by which the premiers of England and France notified the treaty of London to the Belgrade Government, and called on it to subscribe to the Lloyd-George project, with the alternative of having the treaty of London enforced."

RESENTED AS INTERFERENCE.

Paris got its first news of President Wilson's move in a London dispatch from Pertinax, the political editor of the Echo de Paris, in which he said:

"Not content with dismissing Lansing, his Secretary of State, in a tone that no Russian despot ever employed toward his most faulty minister, Wilson has mixed in the business of the London conference. In a note addressed to the Governments of France, England, and Italy he declares that on the question of the Adriatic he holds to the point of view expressed in the documents handed Italy last December by the United States, England, and France. If his advice is not taken, he threatens to retire from the conference of Paris.

"If France and England, Jugoslavia having rejected a compromise, authorize Italy to proceed with the execution of the treaty of London, they will find themselves facing a stubborn and threatening Wilson. Lloyd-George and Millerand have just promised Nitti that before he leaves London the compromise or the treaty of London will prevail. I do not know what they will do, but if they allow Wilson to contradict all their decisions it is evident that the best thing they can do is to end their conference and go play in the snow.

CALLS WILSON AN AUTOCRAT.

"It is inadmissible that Wilson—an autocrat, truly, but an autocrat who is about to fall—should be allowed to impose his political conceptions upon us when within a year Republicans will rule at the White House, and in all probability will immediately denounce all his conceptions."

The Intransigeant to-night says:

"Wilson threatens the conference with his withdrawal from its bosom if it adopts any other than his solution for the Adriatic problem; and, inasmuch as the United States possesses a great mass of pounds sterling, francs, and lire, the diplomats in London probably will not wish to unchain the thunderbolts of the American king."

La Liberte says:

"Once more the personal wishes of a statesman who is combatted in his own country and who has not been able to obtain the ratification of the treaty comes to counteract the efforts of the great European powers to remedy the present confusion.

AMERICA CAN HELP BY KEEPING OUT.

"Lloyd-George and Millerand have just given formal promise to Nitti that before the London conference ends the Adriatic affair will be settled by the acceptance of a compromise or by the enforcement of the treaty of London. To this promise Mr. Wilson puts his veto. Closed in his proud isolation, irritated by his malady, without contact with the allied cabinets or with his own ministers, the unreasonable President of the United States pretends to direct from the White House affairs of Europe, of which he has not the slightest conception. Does he know the real situation at Rome or Belgrade? Does he know what concessions Italy has already made?

"There is one thing not to be forgotten, and that is that the financial reconstitution of Europe, for which America gives us its advice, but not its assurance, is possible only if we settle our political problems. In this work the United States can help us by keeping out."

The French newspapers give the greatest prominence to-day to the resignation of Secretary Lansing. Dispatches dealing with the differences between President Wilson and his departing minister receive more attention than even the London conferences.

It is difficult for Paris editors to take sides in the quarrel, for, while they may have lost most of their love for Mr. Wilson, they apparently never had any for Mr. Lansing, because when he was here he was very outspoken in his opinions of certain diplomatic methods of European statesmen.

While not taking in any decided fashion Mr. Lansing's part, the French press in its treatment is distinctly hostile to President Wilson, and generally refers to his treatment of Mr. Lansing as "brutal." For the most part editors allow their American correspondents to do the commenting, and for the moment reserve formal opinions.

Those who do comment find new proof that Mr. Wilson is an autocrat. The Journal says that only the façade of the American administration is democratic. The writer recalls that it was from the day Lansing succeeded Bryan that America became a faster friend of the Allies. He believes that the resignation at this time only means an explosion of a delayed mine and that Lansing and Wilson would have sooner come to the parting of the ways had not Mr. Wilson been ill.

Figaro predicts further upheavals in the Wilson Cabinet.

The comment of the Washington correspondents of the Paris papers is distinctly favorable to Lansing's side of the case.

ALLIED PREMIERS DRAFT A REPLY TO WILSON ON HIS STAND ON THE ADRIATIC QUESTION.

PARIS, February 15.

The British, French, and Italian premiers have drafted a reply to President Wilson's note on the Adriatic question, which will be transmitted through the American ambassadors at London and Paris, according to a member of Premier Millerand's staff, who arrived in Paris to-night.

The greatest discretion is being observed as to the contents of the reply, and it will not be made public until after it is received by the President of the United States. However, another delay in the Adriatic settlement as a consequence of the incident is foreseen in French official circles.

Premier Millerand has called a cabinet meeting for Tuesday to hear his account of the London negotiations. He will also make a statement on the diplomatic situation to the Senate committee on foreign affairs.

TARDIEU BARES TREATY SECRET—FRANCE BALKED AT GIVING UP RHINE'S LEFT BANK FOR ANGLO-UNITED STATES ALLIANCE—CONFERENCE IN DESPAIR—NEAR BREAKING POINT AS WILSON ORDERED SHIP MADE READY FOR VOYAGE HOMEWARD.

PARIS, February 15.

Additional light is being shed here on the peace conference negotiations which led up to the Franco-American-British pact, providing for the defense of France in case of future German aggression, and which caused France to abandon her claim to occupation and the independence of the left bank of the Rhine in return for this alliance.

An interesting revelation concerning this phase of the conference negotiations has just come to wide notice through an article by Andre Tardieu, which appeared in L'Illustration. Capt. Tardieu, who is generally credited with being one of the men who drafted the peace treaty, is regarded as perhaps being in a most excellent position to describe the inside workings of the peace conference in this connection. Needless to say, his article has attracted very wide attention.

"Great Britain, proud of her traditional isolation, and the United States, 'too proud to fight,' and separated from the rest of the world by the spirit of Washington and his advice against entangling alliances and by the Monroe doctrine, proposed to France on March 14 of last year a real pact or alliance, giving an immediate military guaranty against unprovoked aggression by Germany," he says in his article.

PROPOSAL PROMISES SOLIDARITY.

"This was an unprecedented, a weighty proposal, which would maintain for France in times of peace that same solidarity by which the war was won.

"Premier Clemenceau, who had 'asked for nothing,' as he recalled with pride some time later in the Senate, at once intimated that he attached a very high value to the offer. However, he asked for time for reflection. In three meetings, held on March 15 and 16, 1919, various aspects of the problem were discussed verbally and three successive notes were exchanged.

"Two important conclusions, seemingly contradictory, were drawn from these conversations. They were:

"1. That it would be criminal for the French Government to renounce an offer made under such conditions.

"2. That it would be equally criminal to be content with the bare offer.

"The apparent contradiction was emphasized when President Wilson made it clear that they preferred military guaranties in exchange for occupation and the independence of the left bank of the Rhine. They wished France to renounce this claim, and thought that such an alliance would be a just equivalent. They wanted the left bank of the Rhine to remain German and to be occupied neither by an international force nor a French force. In return Great Britain and the United States would pledge military support in case of danger."

Mr. Tardieu then proceeds to show the development of the long negotiations day by day; how France refused to accept this proposed alliance and its substitution of one guaranty for another unless accompanied by immediate military occupation.

CONFERENCE NEAR BREAKING POINT.

It was at this point that the entire peace conference seemed to have reached the breaking-up point. Premier David Lloyd-George and the British press were openly aggressive and hostile; Belgium's opposition to prolonged occupation of the Rhine country was expressed before the supreme council, and the American exasperation was manifested in the report that President Wilson had ordered the transport George Washington to Brest to take him home.

French notes began to multiply at a prodigious rate, and two or three of them were dispatched every day. Mr. Clemenceau was in almost constant conversation with President Wilson and Premier Lloyd-George. It seemed that there was no hope of France obtaining the physical guarantees which she demanded.

After many days' negotiations, President Wilson's assent to Chapter XIV of the treaty was obtained by "the Tiger." Premier Lloyd-George followed two days later by giving his assent to it.

Mr. Tardieu refers to Chapter XIV as offering to France the guaranties which Premier Alexandre Millerand, speaking in the Chamber of Deputies recently, said would be fully carried out in case of nonexecution of the treaty.

LANSING MADE THE GOAT, SAYS PARIS NEWSPAPER.

PARIS, February 15.

Commenting on the resignation of Secretary of State Lansing, the Journal calls the event "a striking example of the autocratic régime, the façade of which is democratic. President Wilson returns after his mysterious illness and comes to the conclusion that Secretary Lansing during his absence has been ruling as Lansing wished and dismisses him.

"National representation and popular sentiment are not even consulted in reaching a decision in which Louis XIV would have used more formality. Is not Mr. Lansing called upon to play the classic rôle of the scapegoat, which assumes the burden of his superior's faults?"

The Libre Parole remarks: "President Wilson, who has governed his country seven years without the least regard for national representation, who threw America into the war after winning the election on a peace program, and who domineered over the peace negotiations, returns from a mysterious illness to accuse his foreign minister of governing autocratically during his absence. Isn't that laughable? Mr. Wilson has given the impression for some days that he is preparing to 'change his coat.' Isn't Mr. Lansing's disgrace the first step?"

WILSON ORDERS ALLIES TO KEEP ADRIATIC PLEDGE—THREATENS TO WITHDRAW SUPPORT OF UNITED STATES IF HIS SCHEME IS NOT FOLLOWED—ENTENTE SAID TO HAVE SENT NOTE OF REFUSAL—DIFFERENCES BETWEEN SENATE AND PRESIDENT REPORTED CITED AS A REASON—ALLIES SPEED UP WORK—MOST IMPORTANT QUESTIONS SINCE THE PEACE CONFERENCE NOW BEING DECIDED.

LONDON, February 15.

President Wilson addressed a note to the allied supreme council, which has been in session here, on Saturday, complaining that the Allies' plan for settling the Adriatic question was not in accord with plans previously laid down by him and approved of by the peace conference.

It is reported that the supreme council, before Secretary Lansing's resignation became known, sent back the reply that, owing to the differences between the Senate and the President, it was impossible to apply his solution in the settlement of the Adriatic question.

The decisions now being taken here are the most important since the original peace conference was convened.

There is an insistent desire to settle all outstanding questions of moment, and in order to attain this great object the differences among Great Britain, France, Italy, and Jugo-Slavia have been or are being sunk for the common welfare of all.

Efforts have been made during the last few days to induce Dr. Trumbic, the Jugo-Slav foreign minister, to accept the Franco-British proposals of January 20, which the Jugo-Slav Government had declined. The French premier is understood to have made a personal appeal to Dr. Trumbic in this sense, while Lloyd-George, as president of the supreme council, wrote an official letter in the same sense.

The proposals of January 20 differ considerably from the basis for a settlement laid down in the joint Franco-British-American note of last December to Italy. The January proposals advocated, in fact, several Italian claims which the Franco-British-American note of December had shown to be unacceptable. Some perturbation was therefore caused in the supreme council by the arrival of a note from President Wilson bearing the signature of Secretary Lansing to the effect that the United States adhered entirely to the December note and could not go beyond it.

The American note is stated to be a very cogent document. The views which it expresses are understood to be shared fully by President Wilson and Mr. Lansing and are not invalidated even in form by the subsequent resignation of Lansing on another issue.

NOTES PRESENTED SATURDAY BOTH IN LONDON AND PARIS.

PARIS, February 15.

Hugh C. Wallace, the American ambassador, according to the Temps yesterday, delivered to the foreign office a memorandum from President Wilson, in which the President said he could not approve of Premier Lloyd-George's proposed settlement of the Adriatic question, which has been submitted to the Jugo-Slavs. The newspaper says that an identical memorandum was delivered to the British foreign office in London.

The President gives it to be understood that if the allied powers settle the Adriatic problem without consulting the United States Government, the United States will find it impossible to concern itself in European affairs.

In his memorandum President Wilson criticizes Premier Lloyd-George's plan as communicated to the Jugo-Slavs by the supreme council on January 20. He particularly opposes the idea of giving the Jugo-Slavs the choice between this plan and execution pure and simple of the London pact.

In addition, according to the Temps, the President finds the Lloyd-George plan too divergent from the memorandum drawn up at London last December by Premier Lloyd-George and Clemenceau with the collaboration of the American representative.

The memorandum was immediately examined by the chiefs of the allied Governments before the French premier left London for Paris this morning.

The premiers have drafted a reply, which will be transmitted through the American ambassadors at London and Paris, according to a member of Premier Millerand's staff who arrived in Paris to-night.

The greatest discretion is being observed as to the contents of the reply, and it will not be made public until after it is received by the President of the United States. However, another delay in the Adriatic settlement as a consequence of the incident is foreseen in French official circles.

Premier Millerand has called a cabinet meeting for Tuesday to hear his account of the London negotiations.

Premier Millerand has explained the reported negotiations between France and Jugo-Slavia last fall by which, it was said, a community of interest between the two countries would be recognized in the Adriatic, according to London advices to the Journal. It is said members of the supreme allied council are satisfied with the statement made by the French premier. Premier Nitti, of Italy, is reported to have ordered the suppression of the newspaper responsible for the first publication of the reports.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, as the curtain goes up on another act of the drama of which all the world is the stage I am constrained to ask my seniors and principals if it may be permitted to the chorus to display any but mimic emotions which will serve to keep their principals in countenance? Certainly Shakespeare himself never relieved tragedy by comedy with any such sudden and perfect irrelevance as that presented here in the Senate. Unconsciously we have advanced in technique as much beyond him as ever he did beyond the Athenians. We are invited solemnly to witness the reduction of an irreducible minimum. We are summoned to share in the transubstantiation of a reservation which cut the heart out of the covenant into one so superlatively interpretative that to Americans it will seem to assure their peace and security, while to Europe it will appear to guarantee their participation in every future war, even against the American conscience and judgment. And all this is to be done without sacrifice of intellectual integrity! At the moments when Democrats at the other end of the Avenue and at the other end of the Capitol have broken the leash which bound them to the White House, Republicans here, or some of them, seem to be coming to heel.

The drama is on so vast a scale that this cosmic comedy is played in Washington when tragedy moves the figures upon the stage in Europe. Here, still dissembling its character, still masking its features, still moving before the pretense that it promises peace, Senators propose to ratify the treaty, and at the very moment when the horrid and spectral truth has appeared in Europe to compel the affrighted people to cry out for revision; aye, in the very moment when the council of the league accepts the reservation insisted upon by the Swiss Republic, conformably with her ancient tradition. In the very hour when the leader of the majority and the majority in the Senate are about to be justified by events it is proposed that they shall yield the safeguards to American peace and honor. I speak not only of what has been written or uttered by French and British statesmen and publicists—by Robert Cecil, by Yves Guyot, by Alexander Ribot, and by Lord Grey of Fallodon—in justification of the reservations already adopted by the Senate. I do not speak of the indorsement of Lord Grey's letter by the British secretary for foreign affairs. The readiness of the European powers, thus proclaimed, to accept the Lodge reservations as adopted by the Senate is important, but, Mr. President, less important than the irrefutable condemnation of the "world settlement" spoken by the facts, now no longer to be concealed. Despite distortion by officials, despite difficulty of travel and trouble in transmission, despite censors, the news comes from hither Asia and from central Europe that the peace, that the "world settlement," as it was termed by him who sought to make it for America, that the "world settlement" can not last. Its terms can not be enforced. They can not be met.

I do not condemn them here because they give the lie to our pledges, because they imply tyranny and not democracy, because they violate the principles which we hold dear. I have no word to say against them because they are repugnant to justice and to the precepts of the Christ to whose teachings we Americans subscribe, whether Jews or Gentiles. It is because the terms of the "settlement" injure conqueror and conquered; it is because they spell ruin rather than regeneration; it is because they rivet the chains on subject Asia; it is because they make certain for the future not peace but war that now there goes up from the enlightened souls in Europe the cry for their revision. It is not mercy or justice but truth and wisdom which most loudly condemn the treaty. The voice of truth could not be drowned, even by the cries of the horde of paid proselytizers of a false peace. Numbers of these were honest folk misleading others; among them there were many doubtless themselves deceived. Through the din of cant and of abuse which was rained upon those who dared to criticize the treaty it was hard for the people to learn the bare facts.

How little time has passed since no speech was too violent, no stigma too vile, for some to excoriate or to defame men whose convictions found courage to give tongue to the truth. It was not a task which discretion sought for Senators, but one which duty laid upon them. They faced great odds, those who led in this debate and whom others of us humbly followed. A few months ago there were thousands of our people uninformed or misinformed. There were then, and still are, hysteric males, self-styled liberals, greedy reactionaries, who, irresponsible, ignorant, or indifferent to the public welfare, shrieked "pro-German," "Bolshevist," "Tory" at men who differ from them. I invite the attention of these, as well as that of our fair and honorable opponents upon this issue, to the present views of Englishmen. I quote:

Replying to general criticism of the Government's policy by William Adamson, leader of the Labor Party; Sir Donald MacLean, Liberal leader in the House of Commons; and others who demanded especially the revision of the Versailles peace treaty, Premier Lloyd-George declared that it would be impossible in a single speech to deal with all the questions raised. * * *

Earl Curzon, secretary of state for foreign affairs, thought that the Marquis of Crewe was right when he said that a good deal of the peace treaty might have to be rewritten and revised. None of its authors claimed that it was sacrosanct.

He had not read the dictum of its author again resident on this side of the Atlantic—

"If Germany shows a disposition faithfully to carry out her obligations," he added, "we will do our best to aid her in fulfilling them and resuming her place among civilized communities." * * *

Speaking of the financial provisions of the treaty, Mr. Asquith said they were all agreed Germany should pay a large sum as promptly as possible for her war damage, but he was not sure that it was not more important for the permanent interests of the world to accelerate as far as possible the restoration of the normal economic life of Europe, in which Germany must continue to be an important factor. Germany's total liability—and this was the defect of the treaty—was nowhere defined. She was left with a millstone round her neck.

"As a question of practical business capacity," he went on, "is it conceivable that Germany will be able with her crippled resources to meet liabilities of that kind? To my mind it is absolutely impossible."

It has been sought upon occasion to make it appear that the instrument now before the Senate touched the people of Germany and no others. Again, it has been described as a charter of a new order for all mankind. Whatever the merits of that part of the instrument which determines peace with Germany, or that part of it which is the covenant of the league, their forced and disingenuous union has given this treaty a double character. It affects not only the German peoples, who are to be subjects of the commission on reparations, but also those vast populations in Africa and in Asia, new and old subjects of Britain, Japan, and France, the three imperial powers. There is a warning for us in the news which the cables bring from the shores of the Ægean, the Euxine, and the Yellow Seas. Oriental peoples in whose breasts it was supposed that consciousness and pride of nationality were dead are suddenly filled with the spirit of freedom.

Sir, I beg Senators to consider the map which I once placed before them and to permit me to recall in brief the events described in the cabled dispatches of which I have copies before me. I ventured a few weeks ago to forecast the consequences of the unrest, the rebellious agitation, which is moving nearly 500,000,000 subject peoples in Asia and Africa. It was not hard to see that the first violation of article 10 of the covenant would take place in the vast spaces of Asia where the frontiers of the conquered peoples under the dominion of the three imperial powers march with the frontiers of wronged and outraged China and with those of Bolshevist Russia. Follow the map from west to east, from Gibraltar to Korea. The cables bring reports of sedition and risings against all of the empires—risings ominous of the future.

1. In Morocco the French occupying forces have had bloody encounters with rebel tribesmen.

2. British bayonets have stifled rebellion in Egypt. There, Mr. President, the acknowledged leaders of the Egyptian people have refused even to confer with the British mission upon the basis of the British protectorate over Egypt, approved by Mr. Wilson and recognized by the treaty with Germany. The religious head of the Mohammedan millions of the country has joined his protest to that of its political leaders. They refuse to treat with Britain as a suzerain or protecting power.

3. In Syria there have been armed outbreaks against the military forces of the French Republic.

4. The secretary of the Persian delegation to the Paris peace conference has made solemn proclamation that the treaty establishing the British protectorate of Persia was signed under duress and in violation of the Persian constitution.

5. Arab tribes are making ready to take the warpath against the British in Mesopotamia.

6. The State Department in Washington has formally confirmed the cables which brought the news that the Bolshevists were organizing a propaganda of rebellion and an army of invasion against the British in Persia and in India.

7. In India the president of the All-Indian Congress proclaims to the disaffected from British rule that the fourteen points have been blown to the four winds. The shooting of the hundreds of unarmed Indians at Amritsar is compared with German frightfulness by one section of the British press, and by another is described as a terrible measure necessary to stamp out growing rebellion in northern India.

8. The Chinese Provinces have memoralized the central government at Peking, beseeching that it shall not even negotiate with the Japanese regarding the status of Shantung.

9. We learn that a Korean force, armed and abetted by the Bolshevists, has crossed the Imperial Japanese frontier at the Yalu to raise a rebellion among the unwilling Korean subjects of the Japanese Emperor.

10. But it is not in Korea alone that the Bolshevists are threatening the Imperial Japanese frontiers which this treaty calls upon us to defend. They have seized the Government in that half of the great island of Saghalien which remained Russian by the treaty of Portsmouth, and threatened the other half, which is Japanese.

11. British cables report that Bolshevist agents are stirring up the wild Afghans, the riflemen and gunners of the hills, against Persia and against the British in Persia and in India.

All Asia is quaking. It is moved by such unrest and violence as has not stirred its millions since, under Genghis Khan, they shook the civilization of the world. Now it is purposed to qualify, to attenuate, to weaken the already inadequate reservation under the terrible tenth article of the covenant, in order in some wise to permit the fires of Asia to be quenched in the blood of Minnesota and of Maine, in order to lay the bodies of the youth of North Carolina, of Wisconsin, of Iowa, and of Rhode Island to fester or to freeze upon the altar of an imperialism which America has not willed and which America does not control. In the name of simple, homely candor let us have done with word spinning. It is agreed by the ablest supporters of this covenant—the President and the patriotic and powerful Senator from Montana—that the obligation under article 10 as it is penned, whether moral or legal, is of compelling force, absolute, unequivocal, and unqualified. On the map is written the reason why the democracies of Europe, themselves shackled to their subject millions whom they have never seen, should want America to put the manacles upon her sons and thus share the weight of common empire. Ah, yes; through article 10 they would have us imperialists, too, in the sense that the men of Gideon were Jews. If there be any sincerity in the long and unctious provision of the covenant describing the humanizing mission of mandates, why was the league not vested with mandatory power and supervision over the hundreds of millions already subject to the three great empires as well as over the other thousands whose dominions have been freed from the Turk and the Hohenzollern?

Article 10 guarantees frontiers as wide as the world, guarantees in our blood and our treasure against aggression, even though the conquered millions welcome the aggressors, welcome them as liberators come to free them from the yoke of alien sovereigns. Here is the Bolshevist danger. Bolshevism and the Bolshevik armies may be preferred by the despoiled Chinese, the conquered Korean, the subject Indian, the protected Persian, the mandated Syrian to the heavy justice or the iron benevolence of the mandatory or sovereign powers. Under this tenth article of the league covenant our men must die perhaps to deny these conquered peoples a government of their choice.

Mr. President, if Asia presents the vaster field for the future spilling of American blood unchallenged by an American Congress, there is another field where the arbitrary determination of frontiers, where the violation of the principles of self-determination and of nationality promise international revolutions which the treaty makers counted on American bayonets to suppress.

Perhaps in the present state of European civilization this had to be. I do not say that mankind must censure the statesmen at Paris who in the hour of victory divested themselves of the moral courage, the prudence, and the principles armored in which they had led the hosts of democracy to battle. When they entered the secret conclave they seem to have left their pledges at the threshold, even as they left their garments in the hands of their attendants. Now, Orlando is gone. France has done with Clemenceau. Lloyd-George's followers are seeking new leaders. Here the resumption of Democratic leadership by Mr. Bryan requires no comment.

The authors of the treaty secretly made ready, in the heart of Europe, the combustible material of a new war. They Balkanized the country between Riga and Belgrade. If they were induced by expediency to abandon the form of the secret treaties, they preserved their substance. In order to satisfy the still hot hate of the allied peoples, they compelled the separation of Austria from Germany and vested in France the absolute veto of any ultimate union. They avenged the manhood of Europe, sacrificed to the military madness of the Hohenzollern, by providing for the starvation of the children and women of Vienna—Vienna, once care free and gay—Vienna, mother of medicine and teacher of healing, in whose hospitals travelers tell us half the women who now give birth to children die with their newborn babes of hunger or exhaustion. The cables bring the news that 40,000 starving Austrian children have been carried to Italy, there to be nursed back to health in the homes of the men who fought their fathers.

Austria is a bankrupt State—

Says Mr. Asquith, according to the press—

The treaty imposes an undefined liability upon her as regards the total amount she is to hand over, in addition to which she is to provide 19,000 head of cattle, horses, and sheep, and that in a country where the condition of the population is such that we are making appeals in our churches and on platforms in order that they may be saved from starvation.

The peace, Herbert Hoover has stated, condemns Austria to perpetual penury. It condemns Czechoslovakia to perpetual civil strife. You have read, Mr. President, a summary of the report of the Czechish minister of war that conscription in his country is necessary to-day because of the disloyalty and disaffection of large elements of the population. The treaty makers have compacted within the boundaries of Czechoslovakia the very diverse, warring, racial elements which made representative government and national purpose impossible in Austria-Hungary under the Hapsburgs. At one end of the new State the population must instinctively seek union with its kinsfolk of Germany, and at the other, union with its Magyar brethren, while in the center religious strife already has separated the Slovaks from the Czechs.

The great Senator from Pennsylvania, as Mr. Lansing foresaw, was the first clearly to understand the terms of this treaty. He was denounced because he said of it in the Senate what public men everywhere are saying to-day, and what all men will know of it to-morrow.

The Sun and New York Herald, whose correspondent forecast by some days Lord Grey's letter, published under date of February 6 a cable from London which anticipated Lord Curzon's avowal that revision of the treaty would be necessary. I read it:

LONDON, February 6.

Spreading symptoms of economic ruin and anarchy in central Europe have brought about the momentous decision in the highest quarters, the correspondent of the Sun and New York Herald is able to state without qualification, that the economic clauses of the peace treaty must undergo a drastic revision that will mean practically scrapping them. This action will be taken for four reasons:

1. Because there is no longer the slightest possibility that Germany will fulfill the obligations fastened on her by the peace treaty as regards indemnities.

2. It will enable the continental Governments to deflate their balance sheets by compelling those Governments to adopt adequate taxation measures.

3. If revenues are made to meet expenditures, further outpouring of paper money will be rendered unnecessary.

4. It will have a favorable effect toward restoring the value of continental exchange and make it possible to meet objections which now prevent the raising of foreign credits in order to rehabilitate industry.

Although it can not be stated with assurance what lines the modification of the treaty will take, it is likely that Great Britain will assume the leadership by renouncing her claims for any indemnity or cash payment from Germany. There also is a possibility that England may cancel the indebtedness of the Allies to her, although this does not come under the treaty revision plans.

GERMAN INDEMNITIES ESTIMATED AT $40,000,000,000.

The tremendous indemnities not only in cash but in coal from Germany will undergo such modifications as will bring them within the bounds of her capabilities and prevent her from falling into a state of progressive decay.

Germany has been saddled with indemnities estimated at about $40,000,000,000, on which the annual interest charge is about $2,000,000,000. Even if her trade were prosperous the highest estimate places her ability to pay at not more than $500,000,000 a year, and at present she is able to pay nothing because she has an unfavorable trade balance.

Even aside from the indemnities she is unable to pay her own Government expenses, and vast amounts of paper money are being issued for that purpose, as well as to pay German subjects whose properties have been confiscated by the treaty or who were compelled to give up their foreign investments.

The treaty provides that Germany must deliver 48,000,000 tons of coal a year to France and Belgium; this also must be paid for, necessitating the issue of more paper money.

Notwithstanding Germany's palpable inability to pay, France and Italy, and to some extent Belgium, have continued to delude themselves by huge issues of paper money in lieu of taxation in order to meet the Government expenditures. The people of these countries have been led to believe that eventually this paper money will be replaced by German cash.

When official action is taken to revise the treaty these nations undoubtedly will protest, but the financial authorities of Great Britain feel that the weight of responsibility lies on them to prevent further collapse on the Continent, and they have concluded that a lessening of Germany's burden is the keynote of the whole situation, and that this is an imperative step dictated by common sense rather than by sentiment.

At the time the treaty was framed France was obsessed with the fear that unless Germany was reduced to a state of helplessness she would work harder than ever to hasten her revenge, and Premier Clemenceau was admired for the manner in which he overruled everyone who urged moderation toward Germany, but now it is realized that in heeding the French prime minister's appeals the peace conference paved the way for economic disaster for both central Europe and for France. Measures must be taken now to prevent that disaster.

France has expected to float a loan in England in March, but in view of the depreciation of the pound sterling and the franc there would be little chance for its success. It seems, therefore, of the utmost importance that whatever is to be done to right the exchanges should be accomplished before the French loan is floated, as this would supply a good argument for bringing France into line in favor of reducing the indemnities. There is no official basis, however, for saying that the modification of the treaty will take place before the French loan is issued.

A few days ago the Senator from Idaho quoted from the volume by the British economist, Prof. Keynes, whose training has been governmental and academic, while the Senator from Pennsylvania repeated the opinion of Mr. B. M. Baruch, who, like the President's other principal expert, has had a sound schooling in Wall Street economics. They represented their respective Governments at Paris. They agreed that it was not only a moral but a material impossibility for Germany to pay the monetary indemnities fixed by the treaty. Frank W. Vanderlip, formerly of the National City Bank of New York, and aid to Mr. McAdoo during the war, joins in this opinion, and says the treaty, if enforced, spells Bolshevism.

It may not be inappropriate now to recall that Mr. Lansing remarked that if the Senate and the American people understood what the treaty let them in for they would reject it.

The requirements for indemnities paid in kind are as impossible of fulfillment, according to Prof. Keynes, as those to be paid in currency or credit. They are worse than that. They are destructive of the economic rebirth of Germany, and hence of the economic regeneration of Europe. Let me draw your attention to the fourth chapter of Prof. Keynes's book, and more particularly to the second section of it. I ask your leave to consider a summary of Germany's requirements of coal, and that the whole section may be printed in conjunction with what I have now to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCORMICK (reading)—

(iv) The final provision relating to coal is part of the general scheme of the reparation chapter by which the sums due for reparation are to be partly paid in kind instead of in cash. As a part of the payment due for reparation Germany is to make the following deliveries of coal or its equivalent in coke (the deliveries to France being wholly additional to the amounts available by the cession of the Saar or in compensation for destruction in northern France):

(i) To France 7,000,000 tons annually for 10 years;

(ii) To Belgium 8,000,000 tons annually for 10 years;

(iii) To Italy an annual quantity, rising by annual increments from 4,500,000 tons in 1919–20, to 8,500,000 tons in each of the six years, 1923–24 to 1928–29;

(iv) To Luxemburg, if required, a quantity of coal equal to the pre-war annual consumption of German coal in Luxemburg.

This amounts in all to an annual average of about 25,000,000 tons.

These figures have to be examined in relation to Germany's probable output. The maximum pre-war figure was reached in 1913 with a total of 191,500,000 tons. Of this, 19,000,000 tons were consumed at the mines, and on balance (i. e. exports less imports) 33,500,000 tons were exported, leaving 139,000,000 tons for domestic consumption. It is estimated that this total was employed as follows:

	Tons.
Railways	18,000,000
Gas, water, and electricity	12,500,000
Bunkers	6,500,000
House fuel, small industry and agriculture	24,000,000
Industry	78,000,000
	139,000,000

The diminution of production due to loss of territory is:

	Tons.
Alsace-Lorraine	3,800,000
Saar Basin	13,200,000
Upper Silesia	43,800,000
	60,800,000

There would remain, therefore, on the basis of 1913 output 130,700,000 tons, or, deducting consumption at the mines themselves, say, 118,000,000 tons. For some years there must be sent out of this supply upwards of 20,000,000 tons to France as compensation for damage done to French mines, and 25,000,000 tons to France, Belgium, Italy, and Luxemburg; as the former figure is a maximum, and the latter figure is to be slightly less in the earliest years, we may take the total export to allied countries which Germany has undertaken to provide as 40,000,000 tons, leaving on the above basis 78,000,000 tons for her own use, as against a prewar consumption of 139,000,000 tons.

This comparison, however, requires substantial modification to make it accurate. On the one hand, it is certain that the figures of prewar output can not be relied on as a basis of present output. During 1918 the production was 161,500,000 tons, as compared with 191,500,000 tons in 1913, and during the first half of 1919 it was less than 50,000,000 tons, exclusive of Alsace-Lorraine and the Saar, but including upper Silesia, corresponding to an annual production of about 100,000,000 tons.

The prewar figure of 118,000,000 tons net (i. e., after allowing for loss of territory and consumption at the mines) is likely to fall, therefore, at least as low as to 100,000,000 tons, having regard to the above factors. If 40,000,000 tons of this are to be exported to the Allies, there remain 60,000,000 tons for Germany herself to meet her own domestic consumption. Demand as well as supply will be diminished by loss of territory, but at the most extravagant estimate this could not be put above 29,000,000 tons. Our hypothetical calculations, therefore, leave us with postwar German domestic requirements, on the basis of a prewar efficiency of railways and industry, of 110,000,000 tons, against an output not exceeding 100,000,000 tons, of which 40,000,000 tons are mortgaged to the Allies.

But the general character of the facts presents itself irresistibly. Allowing for the loss of territory and the loss of efficiency, Germany can not export coal in the near future (and will even be dependent on her treaty rights to purchase in upper Silesia) if she is to continue as an industrial nation. Every million tons she is forced to export must be at the expense of closing down an industry. With results to be considered later, this within certain limits is possible. But it is evident that Germany can not and will not furnish the Allies with a contribution of 40,000,000 tons annually. Those allied ministers who have told their peoples that she can have certainly deceived them for the sake of allaying for the moment the misgivings of the European peoples as to the path along which they are being led.

(2) The provisions relating to iron ore require less detailed attention, though their effects are destructive. They require less attention, because they are in a large measure inevitable. Almost exactly 75 per cent of the iron ore raised in Germany in 1913 came from Alsace-Lorraine. In this the chief importance of the stolen Provinces lay.

There is no question but that Germany must lose these ore fields. The only question is how far she is to be allowed facilities for purchasing their produce. The German delegation made strong efforts to secure the inclusion of a provision by which coal and coke to be furnished by them to France should be given in exchange for minette from Lorraine. But they secured no such stipulation, and the matter remains at France's option.

The motives which will govern France's eventual policy are not entirely concordant. While Lorraine comprised 75 per cent of Germany's iron ore, only 25 per cent of the blast furnaces lay within Lorraine and the Saar Basin together, a large proportion of the ore being carried into Germany proper. Approximately the same proportion of Germany's iron and steel foundries, namely, 25 per cent, were situated in Alsace-Lorraine. For the moment, therefore, the most economical and profitable course would certainly be to export to Germany, as hitherto, a considerable part of the output of the mines.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is appropriate at this juncture in the Senator's remarks to add that if the plebiscite soon to be held in Silesia should result unfavorably to Germany there will be a still further diminution of her resources in iron and in coal.

Mr. McCORMICK. I thank the Senator.

Prof. Keynes, whom the New York World announces probably will be the chancellor of the exchequer, if a liberal-labor coalition succeeds the Lloyd-George cabinet, points out that perhaps an inevitable consequence of the treaty is the destruction of the German iron and steel industry through the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine to France It would seem that the authors of the reparation and economic clauses of the treaty sought their precedents in a very ancient, but until recently not very much admired, authority. They seem to have turned for their model to the fifth chapter of Exodus, wherein it is written that Pharaoh commanded that "Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore."

Germany has merited bitter punishment, but, as Mr. Asquith has said—

> This is not statesmanship. It is not business or common sense. It is not that clean peace which always meant a peace that would end war. It is not that clean peace that all of us, without distinction of party, were demanding and clamoring for 18 months ago.

As it is written in the Book of Jeremiah:

> For they have healed the hurt of my people slightly, saying, "Peace, peace," when there is no peace. Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination? Nay, they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush: Therefore shall they fall among them that fall: In the time of their visitation they shall be cast down, saith the Lord.

When other efforts to coerce Senators had failed, it was bruited abroad that this warrant for the economic ruin of Europe contained in its text some magic phrase which would cure the disorder in international exchanges, redress the balance of trade, imbue limitless issues of unsecured paper money with real value, and find for mankind a substitute for labor and a permanent alternative for taxation. Otherwise skeptic and prudent merchants, aye, and bankers, for a moment, were deluded by this crass falsehood. Happily, in London, Reginald McKenna, formerly chancellor of the exchequer, and, in Washington, CARTER GLASS, formerly Secretary of the Treasury, put an end to that delusion. In great part the fall of the franc, the lira, and the pound sterling in the American money market has been due to the false hope that the whole economic burden of the war could be placed by the treaty upon the shoulders of the vanquished peoples, even before they were ready to stand and bear it. The treaty itself, far from tending to relieve the distress in the international monetary exchanges, aggravates that distress. Manifestly, the treaty was intended to destroy in great part German trade and German industry. In so doing, it destroys German credit and the sources of German taxation. Who in America, banker or modest investor, would buy the German bonds provided for under the indemnity clauses of the treaty knowing that German industry was to be destroyed by the very treaty which required the issue of the bonds? Thus it is that the French budget, predicated upon false hopes of indemnities, has come to imply a deficit and continued inflation of the currency, with a disastrous result to the exchanges.

Mr. President, there are many reasons for the growing condemnation of this treaty, for the growing demand for its revision. For one I have opposed consenting to its ratification, because I believe that the ratification by the United States will not further, but will prevent, either the revision of the treaty of peace with Germany or the substantial amendment of the covenant of the League of Nations to make it safe for America to enter it. It is precisely because the Senate has refused to ratify that Europe has announced that she would accept any reservations which the Senate might see fit to make to the covenant. It is our abstention which has emboldened Englishmen of all shades of opinion now to propose a revision of the terms of indemnity. Let us not delude ourselves. As the most powerful mind in this Senate has pointed out, a reduction in the sum of reparations or indemnities may be agreed to only with the consent of the interested Governments and by the unanimous agreement of the reparations commission.

If Germany default, whether deliberately and by chicane or by inability to pay, the period for the military occupation of the territory to the west of the Rhine may be extended. The French prime minister, recognizing that French opinion which demands the continued separation from Germany of the territory west of the Rhine, has given notice, according to the press, that France intends, even without consultation with her European allies, to prolong the period of French control in the Rhenish Provinces. American ratification, and above all American ratification if it be inclusive of article 10 in any sense, not only guarantees the conquests of the ages in Asia, but pledges American bayonets to enforce, against any uprising in Europe, the assessment and levy of the last penny under the decision, the secret decision, of the reparations commission.

Mr. President, I shall presently, on another day, ask the Senate to consider the powers of the reparations commission and the relation of the secret treaties to the instrument before us. To-day, let me read the published statement of the Senator from Massachusetts:

> After four months of careful consideration and discussion, the reservations were presented to the Senate. They were purely American in their character, designed solely to Americanize the treaty and make it safe for the United States.
>
> Those reservations as presented to the Senate will stand. There is no room for further compromise between Americanism and the super-government presented by the league. All I ask now is that we may have the opportunity to lay those reservations before the American people. To that great and final tribunal alone would I appeal.
> I wish to carry those reservations into the campaign. I wish the American people to read and study them. They are not like the covenant of the league. They are simple.
> I do not see that there is one of them to which any American can object. I want the people to see them, understand them, and think of them in every household, on every farm, in every shop and factory throughout the land. Then let them decide. (New York Times, Nov. 21, 1919.)

The venerable Senator from Massachusetts sits here now in succession to a great son of the old Commonwealth, a great Senator and a great American, whose name, by common consent, stands at the head of the roll of all those who ever in this Chamber served the American people. He was beloved and revered in his time. His name to-day is cherished above all others who have been Senators, not for the compromises which he made to secure his own ambition, nor for the others contrived as he thought to preserve the Union, but for his uncompromising defense of the Constitution of the United States, whether it were assailed by those who would destroy it through secession or by another who threatened it by an act of usurpation.

> I feel the magnitude of this question. We are coming to a vote which can not fail to produce important effects on the character of the Senate and the character of the Government.

Fourscore years ago and more thus spoke, yonder in the old Hall of the Senate, the greatest of all Senators.

> Unhappily, sir, the Senate finds itself involved in a controversy with the President of the United States. * * *
>
> It is not to be concealed that the Senate is engaged against imposing odds. It can sustain itself only by its own prudence and the justice of its cause. It has no patronage by which to secure friends; it can raise up no advocates through the dispensation of favors, for it has no favors to dispense. Its very constitution, as a body whose members are elected for a long term, is capable of being rendered obnoxious, and is daily made the subject of opprobrious remark. * * *
> The fathers accomplished the Revolution on a strict question of principle. * * * They went to war against a preamble. They fought seven years against a declaration. They poured out their treasures and their blood like water, in a contest against an assertion which those less sagacious and not so well schooled in the principles of civil liberty would have regarded as barren phraseology, or mere parade of words. They saw in the claim of the British Parliament a seminal principle of mischief, the germ of unjust power; they detected it, dragged it forth from underneath its plausible disguises, struck at it; nor did it elude either their steady eye or their well-directed blow till they had extirpated and destroyed it to the smallest fiber. On this question of principle, while actual suffering was yet afar off, they raised their flag against a power, to which, for purposes of foreign conquest and subjugation, Rome, in the height of her glory, is not to be compared; a power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England.

So said Daniel Webster. A greater danger than he faced calls us to duty. Let us fortify ourselves against acrid passion, mad ambition, misunderstanding, and greed. Let us arm ourselves with good conscience and calm reason. Let us be steadfast, or children who now play about our knees, mothers some day, will live to hate our memories because here we dug the graves of their still unborn sons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Applause in the galleries is forbidden. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the first reservation.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gronna	McCormick	Smoot
Beckham	Hale	McCumber	Spencer
Brandegee	Harding	McKellar	Stanley
Calder	Harris	McNary	Sterling
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Henderson	Nelson	Thomas
Colt	Hitchcock	New	Townsend
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Underwood
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Kendrick	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Keyes	Phipps	Warren
Fernald	King	Pittman	Watson
Fletcher	Kirby	Ransdell	Wolcott
France	Knox	Sheppard
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Simmons
Gore	Lodge	Smith, Ga.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are detained by illness in their families.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is absent on account of illness of a member of his family.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are detained on official business.

Mr. HARRIS. The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. GRONNA. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to the roll call, there is a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as I must leave to-morrow, I want to submit a very few remarks upon one or two features of this treaty, and especially on the aspect as it now presents itself, I think, to the American people.

The vast majority of the people of the United States are asking the American Senate to unite in some kind of a reservation that will enable the treaty to be acted upon favorably. I think that is almost a universal sentiment throughout the country. They are tired of this eternal disagreement on matters that are not at all substantial. They are tired of this child's play of obstinacy of factions, when the obstinate disposition seems to center upon a matter that is not at all important. There is no substantial difference to-day between the reservations supported by each of the two factions which alone are responsible for the failure of the ratification of this treaty. There are a number of Senators to-day who are ready to vote for the Lodge amendments, and then vote to put the treaty through with the so-called Lodge amendments. Those same Senators are ready to-day to vote for the so-called Taft substitute for reservation No. 2, and they are willing to support the bipartisan reservation to article 10. They are willing to support either of these, because they mean exactly the same thing; and I defy any Senator to point out to me any substantial difference between the so-called Lodge reservation to article 10 and the so-called Taft reservation to article 10. There is no difference whatever in legal effect between these two, which the Democratic members say they are willing to support, and they say they are willing to support either one of two which they propose and the Lodge reservation.

I will take up first the Taft reservation.

Our position as Senators, I must admit, is not a very enviable one. A number of Senators whom we call the radical reservationists declare that they will not vote for the treaty unless it contains the so-called Lodge reservations in their exact form, without a single change in words, even though there is no change in the meaning. On the other hand, there are a number of Democratic Senators who say they want the treaty, but they will not vote for it unless it contains their reservation to article 10, which they denominate the Taft reservation, even though the Taft reservation means exactly the same thing as the Lodge reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator will not say that the Taft reservation is our reservation. The only reservation that the Senators on the minority side have agreed upon as our reservation was the reservation which I presented here after it was submitted to the Democratic caucus. That was a purely interpretative reservation. What we have said is that we will abandon our reservation and accept either the reservation proposed by the former Republican President, Mr. Taft, or the reservation devised and formulated in the bipartisan conference of Democrats and Republicans, jointly. We say we are willing to accept either of those as a compromise. They are not our propositions. To me, they are distasteful.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I understand that. I am not considering whether they constitute the Democratic proposition. The Democratic standpoint was to have no reservations. That was their proposition, and I am not criticizing them for it; but the point is that they say in their signed statement that they are willing, for the purpose of compromise, to accept the Taft reservation to article 10, but they are not willing to accept the so-called Lodge reservation to article 10, although they both mean the same thing. Now, my criticism is aimed at both of these factions who refuse to get together. Neither side will agree to vote for a proposition that is put forth by the other faction, even though it means substantially the same thing as the one presented.

Mr. McCORMICK and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois, because he rose first.

Mr. McCORMICK. I only rise to beseech my friend, the Senator from Nebraska, as he disavows Mr. Taft's plans to advance this treaty, not to impute them to us, even in the moment of his disavowal. I speak for the mild brethren as well as for the irreconcilable ones.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not like to admit that either the so-called Taft reservation or the reservation worked out by the bipartisan committee is in substance identical with the Lodge reservation; but if the Senator is correct in that view, it seems to me that the strictures directed against the Democratic Members may be equally urged against the Republican Members.

Mr. McCUMBER. I just stated that my criticism was aimed as strongly against one faction as the other. I think I made that clear.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute. There are a sufficient number of Members of these two irreconcilable factions to constitute more than one-third of the Senate, and if they refuse to compromise or come together upon a matter in which I insist there is no substantial difference, of course, we can get no treaty.

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator, I am sure, will not accuse this side of the Chamber of failing to compromise when we are offering two methods, either of which would be a compromise; but can the Senator point out on the other side of the Chamber any Senator who is offering any method of compromise?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, the Lodge reservation was a compromise reservation. It differed very materially from the original Lodge reservation. It did not go as far as I would like to have it go in order to reach a compromise, but it was nevertheless a substantial compromise as compared with the original Lodge reservation; so it is hardly fair to say that there has been no compromise on this side.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Ah, Mr. President, there may have been compromises among Senators on the other side of the Chamber, but that Lodge reservation received every vote upon the other side of the Chamber, and it was opposed by almost every vote on this side of the Chamber. Now, a compromise can not be made simply on one side of the aisle. A compromise must be a compromise between the two sides; and I ask the Senator again, can he point out a single proposition from any Senator on the other side of the Chamber that looks in the direction of a compromise? Is not the sole situation to-day that Senators on the other side of the aisle are demanding surrender from this side of the aisle?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Members on the other side of the aisle propose a reservation which to my mind means exactly the same thing as the one proposed on this side, I do not think it is a surrender on either side if they get together and adopt either one of the reservations. I think one of them ought to be adopted. I have no objection to adopting the Taft reservation or the bipartisan reservation, because I can not see any difference between them and the Lodge reservation, and I think the reading American people understand the situation fully; but if they do not know exactly where the line of demarcation between these two factions is located, they ought to know that there is no real line of demarcation between them except the determination of each faction to have its own sweet way.

Now, I am going to take up these two reservations and consider them from the beginning to the end.

For instance, one reads—that is the Lodge reservation—

The United States assumes no obligation—

And so forth. The other reads:

The United States declines to assume any obligation—

And so forth. Now, think of Senators of the United States refusing to get together because one wants to use the words "The United States assumes no obligation" and the other wishes to use the words "The United States declines to assume any obligation"! That fairly illustrates the situation as we approach it to-day in the Senate of the United States. I want, right here, to read in full the so-called Lodge reservation No. 2 to article 10, and then the other offered by the other side of the Chamber as a substitute.

The Lodge reservation, as will be remembered, was the creature of compromise. I for one am satisfied with this Lodge reservation as I would be satisfied with the Taft reservation or the so-called bipartisan reservation. Now, the Lodge reservation reads:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Now, take the Taft reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that part of the subject, he has referred a number of times to the Lodge reservation in relation to article 10 being a compromise.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not say it was a compromise between Democratic Senators and Republican Senators, because I regard this not as a partisan question at all, but it was a compromise between those who desired very radical reservations and those who desired no reservations, or those that were not radical. In that sense it was the creature of a compromise.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I asked for information. I never knew that anyone on this side of the Chamber was in any wise whatever consulted with reference to the character of that reservation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Individually, yes; they were consulted because I talked myself with a good many Senators on the other side who are in sympathy with me in wanting to get reservations that would secure a sufficient number of votes to ratify the treaty, and I did the best I could to strike off the rough corners from the original reservation to article 10.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad to have the information, because I never before knew that anyone on this side of the Chamber was even consulted as to its language before the Lodge reservation was reported to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I consulted a goodly number of Senators on the other side.

I have read the Lodge reservation, and I want to now read the reservation which members on the other side say they will accept as a compromise. Let us see if we find any real difference in them.

The so-called Taft reservation reads:

The United States declines to assume any legal or binding obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10 or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose; but the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power in the premises, will consider and decide what moral obligation, if any, under the circumstances of any particular case, when it arises, should move the United States in the interest of world peace and justice to take action therein, and will provide accordingly.

Now, both these reservations must be construed in the light of other articles of the treaty. Remember that both of them refer only to article 10. Under the Lodge reservation, of course "the United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10." Under the Taft reservation, "the United States declines to assume any legal or binding obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10."

What real difference is there between these two propositions? To be sure, the Lodge reservation says "no obligation." The Taft reservation says "no legal or binding obligation." You may say that the words "moral obligation" are necessarily included in the Lodge reservation. The only obligation, however, Mr. President, which comes into existence must arise by virtue of the agreement, and the agreement alone can make it a legal or a binding obligation; and if there is no legal or binding obligation, there can not possibly be any moral obligation to do that which you have stated that you will not be legally bound to do.

Now, wherein do these two differ? It is a mere play upon words to assume that there is any real difference between these two reservations.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. If the Senator will pardon me, might I express it in this way? A treaty is a contract. We are therefore speaking about a contractual obligation. It is because it is a contractual obligation that it is binding, and when you take this contractual obligation out of the contract there is nothing left of the contract.

Mr. McCUMBER. Neither a moral obligation nor any other obligation.

Mr. COLT. It only confuses the mind to speak of moral obligations, because in a broad sense all treaties are moral obligations. A treaty is a contract between sovereign nations and is as binding as any other contract. When you except yourself from the obligations of a contract the contract falls.

I merely wanted to suggest that inasmuch as a treaty is a contract, the obligation is contractual, and to my mind that clears the atmosphere.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. I thank the Senator. We agree entirely. If the contract declares that there shall be no legal or binding obligation upon the part of any country or any party to that compact to do a certain thing, then there is no moral obligation, of course, to do it, because the only obligation there is arises from the contract obligation.

But I desire to carry this further in a comparison of the two reservations. The Lodge reservation further reads "or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose." The Taft reservation reads "or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose." There again the two reservations are exactly the same. The Lodge reservation, however, includes the words "or to interfere in any controversy between nations, whether members of the league or not." Now, the Taft reservation omits these quoted words, but this refusal to be obligated to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, is limited under the Lodge reservations to the provisions of article 10, and as both the Lodge and the Taft reservations declare that the United States will not assume any—and I put emphasis upon the word "any"—obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of that article, they can not possibly interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of that article. Therefore the two are not at all at variance.

Under the Lodge reservation the United States assumes no obligation "unless in any particular case Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide." The Taft suggested reservation declares, as I have shown, exactly the same obligation and goes on to say, "But Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power in the premises, will consider and decide what moral obligation, if any, under the circumstances of any particular case, when it arises, should move the United States in the interests of world peace and justice to take action therein, and will provide accordingly."

What earthly difference is there between that declaration contained in the Lodge reservation, "unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide," and the Taft reservation which I have just quoted? There is no difference whatever in the meaning of those two provisions. In both instances it is left for Congress to decide, not now but when the occasion arises, whether it will move at all in the matter. Both reservations declare absolutely that no obligation shall be assumed under the provisions of article 10 to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country. Both of them leave it for Congress to decide when the occasion arises what the duty of the United States shall be in the premises. The only obligation left under article 10 by either or both of these reservations is the obligation to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of every other nation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator take the position—and I ask for information—that there may not arise a moral obligation between nations not predicated upon a legal obligation or growing out of legal considerations?

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is any kind of a moral obligation, it is left in both of these reservations to be determined by Congress at the time. Let me say, as I have tried to make clear before, when you by contract declare that you shall not be obliged to do a certain thing, there is no moral obligation under the contract to do the thing, but there may be other things outside that may arise at any time which will make it morally obligatory upon you to do just exactly what you said would not be an obligation against you. But under the treaty and under the reservations there is no moral obligation to do the thing referred to.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit a further interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that frequently during the debate attempts were made to differentiate between legal obligations existing between governments and moral obligations, and, as I recall it, some of the Senators and some publicists and writers who were discussing the treaty declared that there were no legal obligations existing between nations; that there were only moral obligations; that international law itself created no legal obligation between nations, but that moral obligations alone arose between nations.

Now, assuming that such views and declarations are founded in logic, in law, or rest upon any valid basis, does not the Senator see that the Lodge reservation is an express negation of any moral obligation, whereas the Taft reservation does recognize if not the probability at least the possibility of a moral obligation, yet, of course, committing to Congress the right to determine whether the moral obligation arose?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator in answer that the original Lodge reservation as it was drawn did negative any moral obligation whatever. That was changed. It was changed in such a manner that the Lodge reservation left it to Congress to determine what our moral duty would be when the occasion arose. Now, under the Lodge reservation, while it declares that the United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other nation, it does not say that the United States will not do so if it sees fit so to do. It leaves the matter entirely up to Congress, and that is exactly what the Taft reservation does. It says that there shall be no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, but it leaves to Congress the right to determine whether a moral issue may arise at the time, and the Lodge reservation leaves it exactly in the same way. Let me give a little illustration right here.

We were under no legal obligation to free Cuba from Spain. The American people felt that they were under a moral obligation to do so, because the acts of Spain in the treatment of her dominions on this side of the ocean, and especially this island of Cuba, were such that we believed it demanded a war on the part of the United States to free Cuba from Spain.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not quite agree with the Senator as to the facts in the illustration which he gave. If I may be pardoned for a digression, I think we went to war against Spain primarily because the rights of American citizens had been and were being invaded and the sovereignty of this Nation had been assailed. But, waiving that and coming to the point we are now discussing, does not the Senator think—and I do not believe the point I am suggesting is mere casuistry—that there would be a difference upon the part of the determining forces or factors—that is, the Governments or their agencies—when they were called upon to decide whether there was a moral obligation or not, if in the one instance there had been a positive affirmation that there was no moral obligation and in the other instance there was a negative statement—that is to say, a statement which did not declare that there was no moral obligation, but left it for the determinators or factors when the circumstance arose to decide whether there was a moral obligation?

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator is not giving a parallel case, because the Lodge reservation says nothing about a moral obligation. It simply says there shall be no obligation. The difference is that the Lodge reservation says the United States assumes no obligation, and the other reservation says that the United States assumes no binding or legal obligation. That is the difference, as I understand it, between the two.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will excuse me once more—and I apologize for trespassing upon his time—the Lodge reservation, with all its implications, goes further than the Senator indicates. "The United States assumes no obligation." That means neither moral nor legal nor binding obligation, whereas the Taft reservation, impliedly at least, in the last two lines of the reservation indicates that there may be a moral obligation arising out of the treaty. So it would seem that there is a distinction between the Lodge reservation and the Taft reservation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator, as a lawyer, would ever say that there was a moral obligation to perform something in a contract which the parties in the contract said they would not agree to perform. If there is a moral obligation, it is entirely dehors the contract, it has nothing to do with it, and it will not have any relation to it under either of these agreements.

What I insist upon is that a declaration that the United States assumes no obligation means exactly the same in law as though the United States had declared that it assumed no legal or binding obligation. I think the Senator would be compelled to agree with me upon that construction. However, returning now to the moral obligation, there is a moral obligation in article 10 that is not affected by either of these reservations.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will.

Mr. COLT. In considering the treaty it only confuses the mind to speak of legal or moral obligations. The question in a treaty is a question of contract. In a contract you are bound to do the thing which you contract to do, and a treaty is a solemn contract between sovereign States. At law, the difference between a moral and a legal obligation is the difference in the means of enforcement, or the sanction. A legal obligation in municipal law is enforced by the sanction of compulsion. An international obligation or contract is enforced by the sanction of the conscience, or public opinion; therefore, it is termed a "moral obligation," because it can not be enforced by compulsion. To my mind, looking at a treaty as a contract, this whole distinction between moral and legal only confuses the mind. A treaty is a contract enforced by a moral sanction or by public opinion, and when you get outside of the contract you have nothing left except the general moral sense of the community. It is the treaty contract which it is important here to consider. When you get outside of that contract you drift simply into the position in which we are to-day, of intervening in any case where we thought we ought to intervene. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator for his interruption.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I myself, in the bipartisan conference, proposed the Taft reservation as a substitute for the Lodge reservation, I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I do not concede the two reservations to be identical in substance; and I should like, for the information of the Senate, to state my own view about it. It is that under the Lodge reservation, when a question arises that would otherwise fall under article 10, Congress may or may not take the matter up for consideration; it does not bind itself to do so. Under the Taft reservation Congress does not obligate itself to assume any obligation at all, but it does obligate itself to take the matter up, and decide and determine it. That is my view about the distinction between the two reservations. I also desire to inquire of the Senator, if he is of the opinion that there is no difference between them at all, whether he would not be very glad to join the Senators upon this side in voting to substitute the Taft reservation?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I shall be glad to join with anyone and with any party that will present a reservation upon which we can agree and in support of which 64 votes can be secured.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator and I stand upon exactly the same ground.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is my position, and I do not care by whom such a reservation may be presented.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has referred to the fact that on the bipartisan conference he proposed this reservation and gave it a construction then which is the same as his construction now. I am sure the Senator from Montana will admit, however, that his colleagues upon the conference upon that side did not concur in the construction which he himself gave to the reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I am not prepared to admit that. I heard no dissent from that view.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator was present when I asked some of his colleagues whether they concurred in that construction, and they declined to say that they did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But none of them dissented from my view as expressed on the matter. I am sure of that.

Mr. LENROOT. Perhaps I had better put it this way: They declined to approve the construction given by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They declined to express themselves on the question asked by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but, inasmuch as it has been referred to, I desire also to say that when it was asked whether the Senator's colleagues would agree to consider a verbiage that would make clear the Senator's construction they declined to do so.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota one other question, as to his construction of this reservation and whether the term "moral obligation" is a moral obligation arising under article 10 of the treaty or a moral obligation arising out of the particular facts and circumstances of a dispute occurring under the provisions of article 10. Will the Senator answer me that question?

Mr. McCUMBER. They both refer to article 10. That is the construction that I tried to call attention to in the very beginning, that, while there was a difference in the wording, they both refer to article 10, and not the general moral obligation that may exist under any other article of the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Do I understand from the Senator from North Dakota that the moral obligation that Congress would decide in a particular case would be a moral obligation arising under article 10 or a moral obligation arising under the facts of a particular case?

Mr. McCUMBER. It would have to arise out of the facts in the particular case, because, as I have said, there would be no moral obligation under the so-called Taft reservation. It must be a moral obligation arising outside of that part of the treaty itself. I think that answers from my standpoint the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The Senator suggests that under the Taft reservation, at least, Congress would be bound to consider the matter, whereas under the Lodge reservation it would not be bound to consider it. That might possibly be true if we had entirely eliminated article 10; but there is another provision in article 10 which, to my mind, makes it absolutely necessary for the Congress of the United States to take some kind of action.

It is this: Neither of these reservations destroys the first part of article 10, namely, that every nation a party to this compact undertakes to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of every other nation a party to the compact. Suppose there are 35 such nations, every one of them agreeing that it will not make a war of conquest against another nation; suppose that Germany should be a party to the compact and should proceed, either with or without notice, to make a war of conquest against Belgium or France or Russia. Under the treaty and under the League of Nations immediately that matter is made a matter of concern to every other member who is a party to the compact. Therefore, it would be the duty of every other member, made so by positive enactment, to take the matter up and to exert its influence in the method prescribed under the terms of the League of Nations to prevent the rupture. So, in either instance I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there would be the same obligation to take up and consider the matter. My own belief is that, so long as we leave that soul and heart of article 10 in the compact, any nation that attempts to violate it without any semblance of justice will find that the teeth will be forthcoming from the other nations to enforce the compact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think the Senator really can contend that a declaration that a matter that is of concern to the United States is equivalent to an undertaking upon its part that it will take that matter up and consider it. We often get letters from our constituents about a matter. I receive one, and I answer, "The matter about which you write is a matter of very great concern to me." That is an altogether different thing from saying in answer to my constituent that I am considering the matter with reference to taking some action to relieve the situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. But if the Senator will re-read the entire League of Nations chapter, he will find there is a provision that it is a duty to bring the matter before the council, and, of course, the council represents the several different countries. Therefore, the question must have consideration by the United States, which would be a member of the council, and that in itself, of course, would require the United States to take some cognizance of what the council recommended in the particular instance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is now talking about the council, but the reservation refers not to action by the council but to action by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point that I am trying to make is that the Congress of the United States, under a treaty by which it had agreed that the matter should be referred to the council, and that it would then consider what the council recommended, would be required to take it up; that means to consider it, which consideration is imposed by other provisions of the treaty; that is all. So I see no real difference between the two.

What is said of the suggested Taft reservation applies equally to the so-called bipartisan reservation. There is no substantial difference between either of them and the Lodge reservation—I say "substantial difference"—and there is no justifiable excuse on the part of either party or faction to the dispute in the Senate not accepting the proposal of the other.

Mr. President, this is not a partisan question, and yet it seems eternally to be considered from that standpoint. No partisan advantage can possibly be had by following the stubborn, uncalled-for, and uncompromising attitude. There is surely enough good sense in the American people to know that there is no justification on either side for the failure to come to an agreement when they are as near an agreement as these two reservations would indicate.

Mr. President, before closing I wish to speak of another feature of the reservations. While I voted for the resolution of ratification with all of the so-called Lodge reservations, I have not modified my views in the least concerning the improper wording of some of the reservations. I think reservation 14 ought to be changed, and I think Senators ought to agree to the change, first, because it is a needless and discourteous statement of the case to our neighbor, Canada, and to Australia and New Zealand; and, secondly, because it puts a construction upon article 15 contradictory to its terms and contradictory to the construction universally conceded, by a declaration that we will not be bound if either the dominant nation or its provinces exercise a power which both are prohibited from exercising under the treaty.

No one, so far as I know, to-day contends in any case where the British Empire or any one of its constituent parts is a party to the dispute that both the dominant country and all its parts are not excluded from any vote whatsoever. That eliminates all argument based upon the assumption that in a dispute with the United States the British Empire would have 6 votes and the United States only 1. As a matter of fact, neither of them has any vote whatever. This is the view taken by the British Empire itself, as evidenced by the statement of Viscount Grey, as follows:

> To any provision which makes it clear that none of those British votes can be used in a dispute likely to lead to a rupture in which any part of the British Empire is involved no exception can be taken. That is the only reasonable interpretation of the covenant as it now stands.

The President says that is the construction that was given to it by every country which joined in the Versailles conference.

> If any part of the British Empire is involved in a dispute with the United States, the latter will be unable to vote, and all parts of the British Empire precisely, because they are partners, will be parties to that dispute, and equally unable to vote.

That ought to settle that reservation, and any reservation pertaining to that portion of the treaty ought not to be inserted which would give the treaty an interpretation contrary to that which all agree to be the proper interpretation.

Reservation No. 14 goes out of its way in its second declaration by assuming that in such a dispute, say between this country and the British Empire, the Empire would have 6 votes, and then provides that if she exercises that right we will not be bound by it.

Why so provide when the treaty provides differently and says it has no vote whatever?

Beginning with line 16, page 6 of reservations, it states that the United States—assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

Well, now, inasmuch as neither can vote, what is the use of inserting in that reservation a declaration that must necessarily be offensive to Canada and Australia and South Africa? It assumes, Mr. President, that under the provisions of the treaty these parts of empire in a dispute with the United States would have the right to vote, and then proceeds to declare that if they exercise that right we will not be bound by it. All of that part, beginning with the word "and," on page 15, down to the end, should be stricken out as misleading and as misinterpretive of the provisions of the league.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator has given a construction that I think never has been given the treaty before, and I should like to ask the Senator, if the United States had a dispute with Japan, how many votes would the British Empire have?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have been discussing the case where the British Empire and any other country had a dispute. If the United States had a dispute with Japan, each member of the council or of the assembly would have a vote. Canada and Australia are members of the assembly. I have not denied that, and I am willing to meet that by any proper safeguard, if any is thought necessary.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator has stated that the part of the reservation to which he now objects was absolutely surplusage and had no place in it. The point I make is that in case the United States had a dispute with Japan the British Empire would have six votes. In case the British Empire had a dispute with Japan the United States would have one vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. In case the United States had a dispute with Japan, I think we could count upon Canada as being with us. We could count almost absolutely upon Australia being with us, and the United Kingdom would never control them against us. So, also, we would have Cuba. We would have nearly all, if not every one, of the South American countries with us, and the Central American countries, possibly with the exception of Mexico, and, in my opinion, we would absolutely dominate the question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is optimistic.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not a bit more so than the facts justify.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute. The Senator from New York says I am optimistic. Why did Cuba declare war against Germany? Why did Haiti declare war against Germany? Why did some ten or a dozen others, including Uruguay and Paraguay and Bolivia and these other South American countries, declare war against Germany? They did not furnish a dollar. They did not furnish a soldier. They could give the enemies of Germany no support, unless it be a moral support. I will tell you why. The United States just requested them to do so, and they complied; and do you think the United States would fail to dominate those countries if we desired to do so? I do not for a single moment.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator why it is that in construing the treaty where any member of the British Empire is a party to the dispute the Senator takes the position that it is so clear that in such a case they would all act together that a proper construction of the treaty would exclude all of them, and then when it gets to every other case he says it is equaly clear that they will not act together?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, Mr. President, simply because in a dispute with a part of an empire you have a dispute with the whole empire, and the terms of the treaty declare that the parties to the dispute are excluded from both. That is the difference, and it is admitted by Lord Grey. It is the construction given by us that if the British Empire or any one of its constituent members is a party to the dispute, it excludes every one of them. That is the right construction, and that is why I say that it will exclude every one of them; but I say that where the British Empire is not a party to the dispute they would not be excluded, and they would not be excluded because she is not a party, and then Canada or Australia or South Africa would have their votes if the matter was before the assembly.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, let us see. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. In such a case, where the British Empire as an empire would be interested in deciding a dispute in a certain way, why does not the Senator, by the same reasoning, necessarily hold that the individual members of the empire would vote in the interest of the empire as a whole?

Mr. McCUMBER. Because the facts would be different. What are they? Suppose a question arose between two countries with reference to Japanese or oriental immigration. Suppose that Great Britain should side with Japan. I am referring now to the single vote of the British Isles. Suppose that the United Kingdom should decide, in a case of that kind, the same as India would decide. The Senator does not believe for a single moment that she would control Canada in her favor as against Japanese immigration. I do not. Lord Grey himself says that Canada generally would be found on the side of the United States on those questions.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator has given one illustration. Let me give him another. Suppose the "open door" in China were involved. Where does the Senator think that Canada and Australia, the individual members of the British Empire, would be—with the home government of Great Britain or with the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. It would depend upon what the question was. I think they would be with the United States if we wanted to maintain the "open-door" policy, and we do. Great Britain wants to maintain the "open-door" policy. So I can see no difference between the countries upon that question.

But I agree with the second proposition of the Senator's reservation, provided it is couched in terms that are proper. I admit that whatever kind of a treaty we put through, the parties on the other side of the ocean will accept. I am perfectly willing to admit that; but, Mr. President, in the settlement of a disagreement with my neighbor I might impose terms that would be acceptable to him and which at the same time would be most selfish on my part.

Let us suppose that I have a dispute with my neighbor, and we agree that we will submit the dispute, not to arbitration, but to a commission for investigation; but I say to my neighbor: "If John Doe and Richard Roe shall sit in that commission and vote, I will not be bound by it." Now, he may say: "I accept that because I think you will do what is right, because of my confidence in your integrity." Nevertheless, I would think it would be extremely selfish upon my part to say: "I will await the decision, and if the decision is against me, then I will repudiate it. If it is in my favor, all right. I simply reserve the right to repudiate it afterward." I think that if I have any reason to believe that John Doe and Richard Roe will not act fairly in this controversy that I purpose to submit, I should say when I submit it that I will not be bound by their action or that I will be bound by it. I think I ought to give notice to those two people, John Doe and Richard Roe, that they are not to vote, and I ought to do it when the matter is submitted and not reserve the right to repudiate their judgment without making any objection before I submit my case.

That was my objection to that feature. Now, I think that could be modified by a declaration that the United States reserves the right to enter an objection to any of these countries voting upon this particular question at the time the matter is submitted. I think that is the fair thing to do, and I do not think we ought to ask for anything different.

Mr. President, I admit that Lord Grey thinks that that will not make any difference. He trusts the United States; but at the same time the word that comes from Canada does not agree with Lord Grey upon that subject. I admit that it is the British Empire, acting through the home Government, which will accept this treaty, and Canada may not be able to help herself; but I think we ought to treat our good neighbor a little more courteously than we are doing by this reservation.

I want to read the further statement of Lord Grey, referring to these self-governing countries:

But as regards their rights to vote where they are not parties to the dispute there can be no qualification, and there is a very general admission that the votes of the self-governing dominions would in most cases be found on the same side as that of the United States.

I think that is true.

Again, he says:

It may be sufficient to observe that the reservation of America does not in any way challenge the right of the self-governing dominions to exercise their votes. Nor does it state that the United States will necessarily reject a decision in which those votes have been cast. It is therefore possible—and I think it is even probable—that in practice no dispute will ever arise.

I think he has correctly stated the situation. I do not believe there will be any dispute where Canada will differ materially from the United States; but you can protect our rights if you think they would be endangered by a Canadian vote without taking the position that we will submit a question and if we find it has not been decided the way we want it, then we will repudiate the decision.

Here is an article I take from the New York Tribune of this morning, from Ottawa:

OTTAWA, February 15.

N. W. Rowell, acting secretary of state for external affairs, declared emphatically to-night that Canada would never consent to ratification of the peace treaty by the United States if the Lenroot reservation was adopted in its original form or with the proposed amendment. Mr. Rowell, who also is president of the privy council, outlined Canada's position in a speech delivered before a mass meeting of war veterans. The Lenroot reservation would deprive Canada of her independent voting power in the League of Nations.

"If the United States Senate should adopt the Lenroot reservation," the secretary said, "either in its original form or amended as now suggested, and should also adopt the preamble as proposed, Canada, as one of the nations of the British Empire and a party to the treaty, would be called upon to decide what action she should take under these conditions.

"There can be no possible doubt what Canada's decision will be. She can not and will not consent to any impairment of her status and voting rights under the treaty. Therefore, when final action on the treaty is taken by the Government of the United States, if the ratification can only become effective on Canada's assent thereto, the ratification can not go into effect so far as Canada is concerned, as Canada will not give that assent.

"Canada has made her position perfectly clear to the proper authorities in London, and she has asked them to make her position clear to the authorities in Washington. We have done this in the interests of good understanding between the United States and Canada.

"The reasons why Canada can not assent are so obvious that they need hardly be mentioned. I shall only mention one. Canada, by the free action of her own government and the whole-hearted cooperation of her own people, raised 600,000 men to take part in this war. She mortgaged her future to carry the burdens which her participation in the war involved. The flower of her youth lie buried in France and Flanders, and thousands more are maimed for life in order that Canada, as one of the free nations of the Britannic Commonwealth, might make her contribution to the cause of liberty and the restoration of the world's peace.

"In the light of these facts, it is inconceivable that any Government in Canada could be so false to both the living and the dead and to Canada's future as to give the assent of Canada to a proposal which would deprive Canada of the position and status won for her by her soldiers on the field of battle, and accorded to her at the peace conference by the enlightened judgment of nations, particularly in the case when full status and voting rights are granted, and we think properly granted, to several nations of the American Continent, which either by reason of treaties with the United States or of economic necessity are dependent upon her, nations which took no part in the war and whose combined population probably does not exceed that of Canada."

I think, Mr. President, that is a strong plea for the rights of Canada. She can not fail to take notice of the fact that black Liberia, with a few hundred thousand population, that never did one thing in the war, is given a vote; that black Haiti, with about 400,000 population, declaring war because the United States asked her to do so, would have a vote; that Panama would have a vote; and that Cuba, Nicaragua, Paraguay, and Bolivia would each have a vote, none of which furnished a soldier or a dollar, and yet Canada should be refused a vote in the assembly; and that is the only place she has a vote.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that this reservation does not in any wise impair the right of Canada to vote. It affects only the right of Canada to bind the United States by her vote. The Senator has read this extract from a speech, and this language which he himself has just read could not have escaped the attention of the Senator:

> Canada has made her position perfectly clear to the proper authorities in London, and she has asked them to make her position clear to the authorities in Washington. We have done this in the interests of good understanding—

And so forth.

The Senator knows that while Canada through this undersecretary or assistant secretary claims the right to bind the United States by her vote, she can not even communicate with the United States except through the authorities at London. Does not the Senator think that when Canada can justly ask the right to bind the United States by her vote she at least ought to be able to communicate with the United States Government in some other way than through the British ambassador?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that raises a question that has been discussed over and over again upon the floor of the Senate. I need only answer that Canada voted herself into this war. Great Britain did not vote her into it. Canada shouldered the debt burdens of the war; they are a mortgage on Canada's future. Canada furnished her 500,000 soldiers to battle in France. Canada left about 100,000 of them buried in France. Now, all that Canada asks is that she shall have the right in the assembly that black Haiti has, and I, for one, whether she is connected as part of the British Empire or not, think she has earned the right.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. Remember that she can not vote in the council, because it is the British Empire alone that is represented in the council where——

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. McCUMBER. I differ with the Senator upon that.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator differs with the President of the United States and Lloyd-George, too.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not differ with either of them.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to ask the Senator this question: He speaks of Canada having the same vote as Haiti. She asks the same right to bind the United States. She asks equality with the United States at the same time she is enjoying the privileges and protection of the British Empire. Whenever Canada wants to bind the United States with the full powers that the United States exercises, the United States will be very glad to welcome Canada when she declares her independence and assumes the full rights and prerogatives of a nation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not Haiti's vote in the assembly bind Great Britain just as much as Canada's vote in the assembly binds us, and is not Haiti absolutely more subjected in her foreign relations to us than Canada is to Great Britain?

Mr. McCUMBER. And can you not include Cuba?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Panama.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and Panama.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Guatemala and Nicaragua.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I only wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota, whom I am sure seeks to be fair as between his own country and the British Empire, to bear in mind that if Haiti, Santo Domingo, Cuba, and Panama each have a vote, so also have India, Siam, the Hedjez, Persia, and Portugal, as dependent if not more dependent upon the decision of Downing Street than Canada, which may not address a communication to the Government of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. I answer the Senator in this way: If you were to deny to independent countries their right to vote——

Mr. McCORMICK. These are not independent countries which I have enumerated.

Mr. McCUMBER. We will see whether they are. If you are to deny to independent countries the right to vote because they are friendly to some other power or because some power, by reason of its geographical situation, would dominate them, I am afraid you would have no treaty. If you are going to measure the strength of the United States with what she can get on this side of the ocean with what Great Britain could muster on the other side of the ocean, I think we would beat her two to one when we came to the enumeration of votes; but I do not think that that is the basis on which we should make the distinction. If I saw any way by which we could increase them all and make them all alike, I certainly would not object to it, if we would not have an unwieldy body; but the moment you go beyond the present treaty and provide for any one country having six votes that it can cast en bloc every other country will ask for the same privilege.

If I believed that Great Britain could at all times cast all six votes en bloc, it might raise entirely a different question. But I realize the Canadian side of it. Even Great Britain admits them rather as partners than as colonies, and says that they no longer exist as colonies. I appreciate the condition at Versailles when Canada, which had fought valiantly during the war, said "I want as much influence in world policies as Haiti."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I have no doubt the Senator sees the Canadian point of view. He has seen it from the beginning of this debate. But I wonder if he heard the complaint of the French delegates to the labor conference that Mr. Barnes was able to deliver the votes of the British Empire in that congress en bloc? It is not that anyone wishes to deny to Canada a vote; it is that in default of an equal number of votes to the United States the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to establish some equality between the two great powers.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that there is any difference between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself on what we want to accomplish. It is rather the different way in which we arrive at the same thing, whether we should recognize, at least, the right of Canada to vote, and in recognizing that right do it with a good grace and say she is entitled to it, or whether we shall say beforehand that we shall repudiate, if a decision happens to be different from what we would like it, any decision if Canada votes for it. That can not but be offensive.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me give the Senator two reservations which I think would cover that freely and fully. I will yield first to the Senator for his question.

Mr. McCORMICK. In order that the Senator's point of view may be met by these reservations, would he be willing to condition our ratification of the treaty and our adhesion to the league upon a grant to each of the major powers of six votes, and failing that grant within six months to terminate our connection with the league?

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope it will not terminate the league in six months if we enter into it. I think it will be six months before we get the matter decided, but I hope we will give it a fair trial.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator answer my question? Would he be willing to condition our continuance in membership upon the adoption of that as an amendment to the covenant?

Mr. McCUMBER. By a reservation in the treaty?

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Giving Haiti six votes?

Mr. McCORMICK. No; giving the six major powers six votes apiece.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not, because then the next six would ask for the same thing.

Now, let us see if we can not meet the situation here.

First, we want to know whether, when we have a dispute with any member of the British Empire, the dispute is with the entire British Empire. We can meet that by a reservation if there is any doubt. There has never been any doubt in my mind as to the meaning of that, and I think that we practically all agree to that at the present time. I do not think the United States, if we ever enter into this agreement, will admit for a moment that if we have a dispute with Great Britain that either of us can vote at all, Great Britain or any of her constituent members; but to make that doubly clear, if we could have a reservation of this kind, I would not object to it, and I do not object to the first part of the Senator's reservation, which means the same thing, namely:

> That the United States understands and so construes the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations that when a case referred to the council or the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire are also represented in the body to which the case is referred, or involves a dispute between one member and any such dominion, colony, or part of empire, both the disputant members, including the dominant or principal country and all its said dominions, colonies, and parts of empire, are to be excluded from voting upon any phase of the dispute.

I do not think there is any question that that is a fair construction, but to make that doubly certain I would favor either the reservation of the Senator from Wisconsin covering the same subject or this. Let us see how we can meet the other. With the slightest modification I think the Senator's reservation could be made perfectly agreeable and yet at the same time have the same force and effect it now has. Suppose it were amended to read thus:

> The United States reserves the right, upon the submission of any dispute to the council or assembly, to object to any member and its self-governing dominions, dependencies, or possessions having in the aggregate more than one vote; and in case such objection is made the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, finding, or decision in which such member and its said dominions, dependencies, and possessions have in the aggregate cast more than one vote.

That is the Senator's own reservation, with the exception that it makes it incumbent upon us at the time of the submission to elect whether we will be bound or not. I think in honor we ought to elect at that time and not say to the other nations of the world that we will exercise our election after the case has been decided and the votes have been cast. I do not think it is a proper position to take on our part, no matter though it would be accepted by other countries.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word about another feature of the treaty that has been discussed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and others concerning the hardships imposed upon the German Empire by the treaty. I confess some surprise in noting what seems to me a very decided change in the attitude of some Senators from that indicated at the time the war was in progress as to what terms should be imposed upon the country which was responsible for the millions of deaths and the billions of indebtedness.

At the time the war was in progress the Senate seemed to be united in its conviction that there should be no terms of peace until Germany had been compelled to agree to a reparation to the full extent of her ability to make that reparation. That is all we asked at that time, and that is all that has been asked since. That she should return the looted property of the devastated countries. Does anyone object to that to-day? That she should surrender for trial those who have been guilty of atrocious crimes contrary to the rules of civilized warfare? Does anyone object to that to-day? What has there been to change this attitude? Is there a single Senator who does not believe that Germany, and Germany alone, is responsible for the war? Is there a single Senator who does not believe that Germany ought to make reparation to the full extent of her power? Of course she can not pay all the enormous war debt. No nation on earth could do it.

No one expects her to do so, no one is attempting to impose it upon her. You talk about enslaving a nation. You can not enslave the German people. I do not think anyone has ever dreamed of doing anything of the kind. You can not obtain reparation from Germany beyond that which Germany is able to pay. You can not get blood out of a stone. You can not take from Germany that which Germany neither possesses now nor can possess herself of in the future. You can not exact money from Germany even to pay one-tenth the part of the devastation caused by Germany unless Germany can earn the money to make the payment.

Now, Mr. President, instead of the treaty being hard upon Germany, while it holds her responsible entirely for all the costs of the war, it nevertheless declares that it does not expect to collect from Germany those costs, but it does expect Germany to do what she can in the way of reparation. I want to read a few of the sections bearing directly upon that part of the treaty.

Let us take article 233:

> The amount of the above damage for which compensation is to be made by Germany shall be determined by an Inter-Allied Commission, to be called the reparation commission and constituted in the form and with the powers set forth hereunder and in Annexes II to VII, inclusive, hereto.
> ARTICLE 234.
> The reparation commission shall after May 1, 1921, from time to time, consider the resources and capacity of Germany, and, after giving her representatives a just opportunity to be heard, shall have discretion to extend the date, and to modify the form of payments, such as are to be provided for in accordance with article 233.

Does that look as though there was an intent to enslave Germany, or simply to ask Germany to do what she reasonably can do to repair the awful damages which she has caused to the world?

Again, let us take subdivision (b) on page 267 of the treaty:

> In periodically estimating Germany's capacity to pay, the commission shall examine the German system of taxation, first, to the end that the sums for reparation which Germany is required to pay shall become a charge upon all her revenues prior to that for the service or discharge of any domestic loan, and, secondly, so as to satisfy itself that, in general, the German scheme of taxation is fully as heavy proportionately as that of any of the powers represented on the commission.

Is that a hardship upon Germany? In our civil courts if one individual by trespass destroys the property of another the courts will assess him for the entire damages, no matter how poor he may be or how rich the party may be whose premises have been devastated; but in this case it is decided that we shall not follow the civil rule; that all we shall ask of Germany is that she pay as heavy taxes in order to make reparation as she imposed upon the other countries in order to defend themselves against her. In Heaven's name, could anything be more just to a conquered country?

Can those who are so solicitous of the German interests as against the interests of the Allies object that in assessing what Germany, the country which caued all this havoc, should pay she should tax herself a sum which would be as high as the taxes imposed upon the other countries which had to defend themselves against her? If Germany compelled France, Italy, and Great Britain by her acts of destruction to levy a tax of 25 per cent to defend themselves, is there anything wrong in requiring Germany to levy a tax of 25 per cent on her people to pay the reparation which she ought to pay? That is all this treaty exacts.

To my mind, Mr. President, that is letting Germany off extremely easy in the matter of taxation. We have no right to assume that the commission will go beyond that. The treaty makers would have been justified in exacting a heavier tribute from Germany; but all they have exacted from her is that she must tax herself a sum equal to that which she forced upon the people of other countries.

If we can not trust the commission, let the United States appoint a good man on the commission. There are Senators here who desire us to entirely abandon Germany, to abandon the whole scheme of reparation, to leave the Allies to determine that question, and then sit back here complaining that they are too harsh. Let us take our part, then, in fixing the reparation and see that the terms are not unduly harsh as against the German Empire.

Let us not forget right here a few other salient facts bearing on this question. While France and Belgium and other countries were devastated, not one foot of German territory was injured, not one single factory was destroyed; every resource that she had at the time she entered into war is still within her territory. Of course, she has lost some of her territory, but that territory is not freed, under the provisions of the treaty, from its just share of the indebtedness.

But it is urged that Germany has not the ships which she had previously. Why, Mr. President, when we were carrying 92 per cent of all of our foreign commerce in foreign bottoms we had an enormous balance of trade in our favor. There will be ships enough to carry the German commerce. The only difference will be that instead of paying the sums to German-owned ships she will be compelled to pay her freightage to ships which are owned by other countries, just as we have been doing for the last 60 or 70 years. We have lived under it, and we have not regarded it as a great hardship.

Why, Senators, German submarines sunk more Norwegian ships than they sunk of French or Italian or any other country's ships except those of Great Britain. She sent to the bottom of the ocean during this war more Norwegian sailors than she sent to the bottom of either French or Italian sailors. Now, after the war is over, after recalling her devastation against a neutral country that was helping her in every way by giving her its agricultural products, I think she can not complain if she has to pay a few Norwegian ships for carrying her commerce. There will be plenty of them to carry the German commerce to every portion of the world.

Again, there is talk about Germany being a weak country to-day. Mr. President, in 5 years, in my opinion—certainly in 10 years—Germany will be one of the strongest countries in Europe. Why? Because of the industrious and economical character of her people. The German people are not afraid of work. They may have socialistic tendencies; they may have paternalistic ideas; but they will work. They will work 10 hours a day or they will work 12 hours a day, and they will work 100 per cent efficient. If you can meet that kind of competition with any labor working seven or eight hours a day, with a half-day holiday on Saturday, and only 65 per cent efficient, you will do more than I believe you will ever be able to do.

Remember another thing bearing upon the matter of taxation to meet the demands of reparation. Germany went into this war with an idea that she would tax her own people just as little as possible; that she would run the war on paper money, and when she was victorious she would put the screws on her defeated enemies and compel them to pay in good gold her entire war indebtedness and as much more as she could exact. She therefore taxed her people but very lightly, and, of course, now that she is defeated, the German paper mark is at a very low value. While she was comparatively free from taxation, the other nations of the world, not knowing whether they would be able to dictate terms of peace, taxed their people to the limit during the war, and then borrowed in addition all they could possibly borrow. They had to borrow from foreign nations. Germany owes no debt to any extent to any foreign nation. Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia all owe the United States huge sums. At this point I wish to present a table showing the comparative taxation of Great Britain and the United States during the last year of the war. The table was made in April, 1919, after the close of the year 1918, and is as follows:

Country.	Estimated prewar national wealth.	Taxation for 1918.	Per cent of prewar national wealth.	Per capita tax.
United Kingdom	$85,000,000,000	$3,816,000,000	4.5	$86.13
Germany	78,000,000,000	1,750,000,000	2.2	22.88
United States	220,000,000,000	4,370,000,000	1.9	39.13

It thus appears that the United States taxed its people one and one-half times more than Germany taxed hers and that Great Britain taxed hers almost four times as much. Is it unfair to say to Germany, "While you taxed your people almost nothing during the war, while you conducted the war upon paper money and without borrowing a dollar outside, you ought to pay in reparation a sum equal to the taxes that were imposed by the other nations upon their people"? All this commission is going to ask is that henceforth, until the German debt fixed by the commission is paid, Germany shall tax herself as much as these other nations have taxed themselves. If there is anything brutal or anything wrong in that, I confess I fail to see it. On the contrary, I think the reparation commission will be generous, and more than generous, in their dealings with Germany, and I wish them to be so.

I think the sooner we forget the war the better; the sooner we eliminate the animosities growing out of the war the better. I wish to see a league of nations; I want Germany in that league of nations, and I want to give her the opportunity which her capabilities will insure to her. If we can not compete with her then, it will be our own fault, and she will be entitled to the world's markets, and I think, Mr. President, she will get her share the moment she gets a stable government, free from the blighting influence of bolshevism. I do not think that we need to worry that the reparation commission is going to inflict a penalty upon the German people greater than they can bear.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had intended when I called up the treaty this morning to say a word in regard to pairs. On a question of such great moment as the treaty of peace I think no one can wish that it should turn on any loss of votes because of the absence of Senators or because of any juggling of pairs. I think that we should take the same course that was adopted with reference to the suffrage amendment, when there was an understanding on both sides that a pair should be arranged for any Senator who was absent on account of personal illness or on account of illness or death in his family. I merely mention this now, because I think the whips on both sides who are intrusted with this matter should see to it that some such arrangement is made. I think that is only fair and proper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question. Of course, the Senator means equal pairs upon the question of the adoption of reservations and amendments?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, and double pairs upon the question of ratification.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When it comes to the final question of ratification pairs would be arranged on a basis of two to one.

Mr. LODGE. They would be arranged upon a basis of two to one, of course. That is the understanding I wish to have. I merely mention it now, because I think it is important that that should be understood. None of us wish to reach a decision of this question by any accident.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent to the effect he has indicated.

Mr. LODGE. Pairs are outside the rules, and I do not think I have any right to ask unanimous consent. I think all I can do is to state the understanding which I hope will be arrived at.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have sent word to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and I expect him here in a moment. If the Senator cares to present the matter again, I suggest that he do so when the Senator from Nebraska returns.

Mr. LODGE. Pairs are wholly outside the rules, as I have stated. Pairing is a matter between individual Senators.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that fact, but I should be glad to see some satisfactory arrangement made.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt the matter will be arranged as it was in the case of the suffrage amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no doubt any such arrangement will be carried out on this side.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wanted to make the suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure we will be glad to see that the final action represents the thought of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. President, in regard to the change in the first reservation which I moved this morning, I wish to say a very few words. The first amendment is the amendment to reservation No. 1, relating to withdrawal from the league. As it was agreed to by the Senate, the last part, which is the only part in controversy, is wholly ineffective. It provides that notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States. The purpose of that reservation was that the Houses of Congress should have the right to give notice of withdrawal, and that result is not obtained by the language of the reservation as it stands. Under the Constitution it is clear to me that any resolution requiring the concurrent action of the two Houses must be signed by the President, and although I know that Mr. Calhoun made an argument in regard to it, I do not see that under the rigid language of the Constitution his interpretation can be sustained. In other words, the words "concurrent resolution" would leave it as the words "joint resolution," where it is now; for no one doubts that a joint resolution of the two Houses, signed by the President, would be sufficient to terminate any treaty or to give a notice of withdrawal from the league.

This league is an experiment, to speak of it in the most flattering language that I can command, and as an experiment I think it is well that there should be some relaxation in the methods of withdrawal. The purpose, if I may repeat myself, is to give that power to the Houses of Congress as well as to the President. The President has not the power specifically under the Constitution. The Constitution is silent in regard to it; but the President has exercised the power, as in the case when President Taft gave notice of the termination of the treaty with Russia without action by either branch of Congress. There may be some doubt about that power, but it has been exercised by the President, and it might easily be exercised again.

In the case of the league, the objection was made that it was a reflection on the President the way it was framed. It certainly was not intended to be so, because the rule of this President is limited by time to a comparatively short period. It is aimed at all future Presidents. It has been amended so as to give the power to the President alone definitely to withdraw from the league, or to the two Houses alone; and in using the language of the Constitution in regard to the passage of an amendment to the Constitution, which is confessedly beyond the power of the President, I think we make it clear.

It is now worded so that it shall read:

And notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by the President or by Congress alone whenever a majority of both Houses may deem it necessary.

Personally, I have no objection whatever to conferring that power, so far as it can be conferred, upon the President alone, and I think it very important that the same power should be reserved to the two Houses. If we are going to have this reservation at all, it ought to be made effective, and I think it is of the utmost importance that the two Houses should have the right to give notice of withdrawal, and I am perfectly willing to leave it with the President. I will admit that I do not mind facilitating withdrawal, but that is the purpose of this change in the reservation. It has, in the first place, the merit of making it effective, which it is not now; and, in the second place, it does give the Congress a power which I think ought to be conferred upon it.

I only desired to make this explanation in regard to the first change in the reservation.

Mr. President, I have no intention of making a speech. I merely desired to explain the reservation, and unless some other Senator desires to go on at this time—as I understand the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is to speak on the treaty, and of course would prefer to speak to-morrow——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator takes any further action, I should like to have printed the following alternative reservations in the usual form.

Mr. LODGE. Are those the reservations the Senator was kind enough to hand to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALTERNATIVE COMPROMISE RESERVATIONS.

On behalf of 40 Senators, Mr. HITCHCOCK, as a means of promoting ratification of the treaty, proposed the following reservations to article 10, either of which will be supported by them:

BIPARTISAN CONFERENCE RESERVATION.

"The United States assumes no obligation to employ its military or naval forces or the economic boycott to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any other article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war, shall by act or joint resolution so provide. Nothing herein shall be deemed to impair the obligation in article 16 concerning the economic boycott."

MR. TAFT'S SUGGESTED RESERVATION.

"The United States declines to assume any legal or binding obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose; but the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power in the premises, will consider and decide what moral obligation, if any, under the circumstances of any particular case, when it arises, should move the United States in the interest of world peace and justice to take action therein, and will provide accordingly."

Whichever of the above reservations is preferred by supporters of the treaty on the majority side will, as a compromise, be acceptable to us.

Mr. McCUMBER. Has the Senator an alternative reservation for this reservation, No. 1?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I have not. I have not offered any amendment to the pending reservation. Those I have offered relate to article 10.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not know whether this is the amendment that was substantially agreed to by the bipartisan committee or not.

Mr. LODGE. It is not. There was some discussion of the matter there. The proposition was made to substitute the word "joint" for "concurrent," and this was offered as another proposition, and there it was left. There was no agreement in regard to it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the conference was fairly evenly divided between using the words "joint resolution" and adopting the method suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. It was before the bipartisan conference, and discussed somewhat, but no conclusion was reached, and I desired to submit it because I thought it was a great improvement, a necessary improvement, in the reservation as it stands.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think it is an improvement from the standpoint of those who want to get out of the league as easily as possible. That is, you place it up either to Congress or to the President.

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has always been my view that there should be a legal act of Congress; that the President and the Congress should unite upon legislation that would take us out of the league, just exactly as they should unite upon any other character of legislation; that it was equally important. I must confess that I do not like the idea of giving the President, whether it is this President or some future President, the sole power, without any act of Congress, to say that we shall be in this league or we shall be out of it. Congress and the country might want to be in, and the President could take us out. It seems to me—I say it with all fairness and earnestness—that it ought to be done by a joint or a concurrent resolution, and that we ought not to give the power to the President alone—a power that is not given him by the Constitution—to take us out of a treaty which required both the President and the Senate to put us in.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the President on more than one occasion—I know on one, and I think on others—has exercised that power, which the complete silence of the Constitution warrants him in doing, I suppose, although I imagine it never has been settled by any definite action. He has exercised the power of terminating a treaty. Of course, if he can terminate a treaty he can terminate a portion of a treaty.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator if he has exercised that power where the power to terminate it was not given in the treaty itself?

Mr. LODGE. The power is not given to terminate this one. It is only a power to give notice.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, I have no doubt but that we can give the President the power to terminate the treaty; but the point I made was that I do not think we ought to place it in the power of one man to speak for the entire Nation and take us out of a treaty that required two-thirds of the Senate and the President combined to put us in.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course, there we come to a distinct difference. The Senator thinks it is desirable to tie us as tightly as possible into this experiment by a two-thirds vote. I do not. I think the Congress alone ought to have the power to withdraw by a majority vote, and I am perfectly willing to give the same power to the Executive, who has charge of a large part of our foreign affairs and all the initiation of our foreign policies. I have no objection to trusting the President generally with the power to withdraw from the league if he thinks fit.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I want to correct one impression that he has of my position, namely, that I would require a two-thirds vote to take us out. On the contrary, I think we can change a treaty by an act of Congress when it is passed by the Congress of the United States and signed by the President.

Mr. LODGE. Ah, yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would require only a majority vote.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; if you had the President's signature.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, I would have it.

Mr. LODGE. But if you did not have the President's signature it would require a two-thirds vote, which is what I am aiming at. I want to give to Congress the power to withdraw from the league by a majority vote. I am perfectly willing to give the same power to the President. As I said, I am not interested in limiting the power of withdrawal from what at best is an experiment.

Mr. President, to return to what I was saying, I have no desire to continue. I have no speech to make. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] desires to speak, I understand, in the morning. If no other Senator wishes to speak now, I move that we return to legislative session.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS AT MILITARY POSTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8819) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make the usual motion, and ask that conferees be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in the original House bill there was a provision which required the immediate dismantling of Camp Gordon. The Senate bill postpones any action upon that camp for a year and a half in order that the requirements of the Government in connection with it might have an opportunity for full consideration. We did not discuss the subject before the Senate. However, before the subcommittee of the Senate which had the bill under consideration I appeared and presented certain reasons which to me seemed conclusive why this camp should not be dismantled at the present time; and I ask leave of the Senate to print substantially what I then said, or most of what I said before the subcommittee, in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HOKE SMITH, OF GEORGIA, BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Senator SMITH. I only wish at this time to refer to the latter part of the provision of the bill applicable to Camp Gordon. I do not ask that any appropriation be made for Camp Gordon, but I wish to call attention to some of the reasons why it would be unwise at this time to take any steps toward scrapping Camp Gordon.

I am deeply interested in the retention of Camp Gordon because it is the logical place for the camp in which will be located the men who hereafter enlist for service in the Army from Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and several other southeastern and Gulf States.

We have adopted the policy of making enlistment attractive to privates by furnishing a short course of two years, divided between military training and vocational training. If the vocational training is handled with the earnest purpose of sending the young men back to civil life greatly helped by their two-year course in the Army, there will be no difficulty about obtaining volunteers. To really get the benefit of this system the camps must be intelligently located, as near as possible to the residence of the boys. The location and work done in these camps will largely control the character of volunteers.

There should be no expense to the Government about maintaining the camps, for the vocational training of the boys should cover all the work needed for the maintenance of the camp, and the boys should do the work of maintenance. Painting, carpentering work, and electrical work should all be taught the privates, and this instruction should be combined with the practical work of camp maintenance.

Some would naturally take courses in agriculture, and 250 acres, intensively cultivated by the soldiers, should furnish much that was needed in the camp.

Camp Gordon is preeminently suited for the purposes I have suggested, and also, on account of its transportation facilities, for moving the soldiers to any part of the country east of the Mississippi where they might temporarily be needed.

In the winter of 1915–16 Gen. Wood was commander of the Southeastern Division. He told me then that as a part of the permanent policy of the War Department he intended to recommend the establishment of a camp near Atlanta for a division of troops, it being the central distributing point between the Potomac and the Mississippi Rivers, and this being a city of such size and with such a variety of entertainment and opportunity for occupation that it was especially desirable as the point for such a location in the southeastern States.

In this connection, I will mention that it is the center of the railroad systems of the southeast, and from it to New Orleans it is 12 hours, to Chicago it is less than 24 hours, to Washington about 20 hours, and all the main lines of the southeast come into Atlanta and have through connections from Atlanta to all points east of the Mississippi.

The Government has invested at Camp Gordon, in round figures, $12,000,000, and the portion which provides for housing and caring for a division of troops is practically permanent in its character.

The buildings are constructed chiefly of heart pine, underpinned with cedar and cypress. The quarters for the men are well provided with baths and toilet rooms.

The base hospitals will accommodate 1,500 patients and the convalescent hospitals as many more. The operating wards and laboratories are fitted throughout with modern equipment. The kitchens, toilets, and everything about the base hospital are constructed upon improved sanitary plans.

The laundry, I am advised, is equipped with modern machinery and steam sterilizers.

In many places I found concrete floors and hard wall plaster for side walls.

There is a complete system of sewerage throughout the camp. Surface water is received in basins and carried off through terra-cotta storm water pipes to the outskirts of the camp. The sewage of the camp is emptied into an antiseptic tank where filtration takes place, and the water is finally discharged free from pollution. The sewerage system of the camp, I am advised, cost $1,250,000. The water supply is by a direct connection from the city of Atlanta supply, the city of Atlanta having extended a large main to the camp at a cost to the city of $250,000.

Provisions for fighting fires are excellent.

In the camp, I am advised, there is a permanent reservoir for 200,000 gallons of water.

There are, I think, 60 miles of macadamized roads in the camp.

There is an excellent electric system throughout the camp, with 25 miles, I am told, of poles and service wires.

Warehouses have been constructed along the Southern Railroad along the edge of the camp to carry supplies for 40,000 troops. These warehouses are well constructed with ample trackage facilities, with concrete approaches, and with fire-proof walls at close intervals.

An engineer who had charge of construction on the ground went over the property with me, and from him and from others I am advised that the plant at Camp Gordon could not now be duplicated for $16,000,000.

I understand that the committee which visited Camp Gordon were impressed with the fact that there was no rifle range left at Camp Gordon. I think an investigation will show that the rifle range used during the mobilization of troops was up the Southern road quite a distance, and the War Department declined to buy it before the 1st of July because the prices asked for the land were considered excessive and because a better place for a rifle range was located by Army officers in June closer to camp, but the purchase was not concluded before the 1st of July, so it was not made.

This newly located rifle range is 2 miles from the camp and can be purchased at reasonable figures. The city of Atlanta spent $250,000 to carry to the camp the same water supply that is used by the city, and if the United States needs 1,000 acres or more for a rifle range and does not wish to pay for it I am quite sure it will be furnished without rental for as long as it is needed.

What I wish to impress upon the committee is that, our military policy not yet having been decided upon, to dismantle this one great central camp between the Potomac and the Mississippi would be a blunder. It may be that at the end of 12 months, when our final military plans are determined upon, you will conclude we do not need a military camp at Gordon. My own view is that under our new policy of giving vocational training to privates in the Regular Army in time of peace, as well as military training, the men should have the opportunity of being stationed as near as practicable to their homes if we wish the best character of men to volunteer as privates in the Army. There ought to be in each one of the divisions mapped out by the War Department a camp for the training of soldiers and for the vocational training that will be furnished in connection with military training.

In Georgia, Wheeler at Macon, Hancock at Augusta, and part of Chickamauga have been dismantled. This is the only large camp that still remains. I think there is but one more between the Potomac and the Mississippi semipermanent in its construction, and that is at Columbia, S. C. All the other Infantry camps with lumber or brick construction south of the Potomac and between the Atlantic and the Mississippi have, I believe, been dismantled.

I understand some thought Camp Benning meets the entire requirement for troops in the Southeast. This view is erroneous. Camp Benning is to be the national training school for Infantry officers. Provision there is made for no permanent troops, but for those who come and go from all parts of the country. If Camp Benning were to be enlarged to take care of Infantry, to provide housing and other equipment for the Infantry of the section, it would cost $10,000,000 not now necessary for Camp Benning.

The southeastern section, between the Potomac and the Mississippi, will need provision for the troops of the locality. Camp Gordon was selected by the War Department as the permanent camp to be retained for troops from Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and one or two other States. It in no way conflicts with Benning, but, rather, its proximity to Camp Benning adds to its value.

At Camp Gordon you have buildings erected from heart pine, a little rough, but durable; you have a perfectly equipped hospital; you have a perfect system of sanitation; you have excellent warehouses; you have water mains and sewage all over the property; and you have nearly 3,000 acres of land, all paid for.

There were a number of buildings started at Camp Gordon not long before the armistice, with a view of accommodating a large number of additional troops, that are not necessary for any permanent system.

I only wanted to submit to the committee at this time the view that to throw away practically what has cost $12,000,000, before you know what your military policy will be and before you have decided what you will need, would be economically most unsound.

I went all over the camp a few days ago with the engineer who had immediate charge in the field of construction, and he has given me an elaborate report on the work. He was a civil engineer employed there on construction; he supervised the work; he went over it with me and called my attention to its durability and to its general character. My only request is that the latter part of that provision—scrapping Camp Gordon—be not concurred in by the Senate.

I think the chances are nine out of ten you will find you will certainly need this camp. To throw it away for what it would bring dismantled with the serious probability, if not certainty, that you will need it, would be a great waste.

Senator CAPPER. How many men are at that camp?

Senator SMITH. I was told on my visit there were over 2,000 men, and there are quite a number of men in the hospital. The hospitals are now being used. The base hospital accommodates fifteen hundred men and the convalescent hospital that many or more.

The subcommittee of the House in their report seem to be of the impression that the ground was not available at this camp for training. It is true there is no target range at the camp. I have already discussed the lack of a target range, and am confident a satisfactory target range can be obtained at a reasonable price or on terms satisfactory to the Government.

The drill grounds in this camp were sufficient to train the Eighty-second Division, and the splendid record of this division in Europe is reasonable proof that they were well drilled.

I am confident Army experts will sustain my view that the only additional land required is the target range.

Senator SHEPPARD. How long have you had this camp, Senator SMITH?

Senator SMITH. It was built at the first of the war.

Senator SHEPPARD. At Camp Gordon?

Senator SMITH. Yes. Before you came in I stated Gen. Wood, in the winter of 1915–16, was the commander of the Southeastern Division, and I think he made a formal report on the subject. He told me he intended to recommend the establishment at Gordon of a divisional camp as a part of the permanent distribution of troops in time of peace, it being the best point between the Potomac and the Mississippi Rivers for such purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. SHEPPARD conferees upon the part of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 17, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 16, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O, Thou Great Jehovah, imminent in all the works Thou hast wrought, attested, in the light of the farthest star that illumines space; in the tiniest flower that blooms on the lonely mountain top; in the most forlorn heart inspired to action.

The world is passing through a trial of greatest magnitude and we call upon Thee for faith, hope, love to guide us, potent factors in the affairs of men, that truth, liberty, justice, mercy, love, may prevail. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 14, 1920, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. FORDNEY, on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALE OF GERMAN SHIPS—REFERENCE OF PETITIONS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that certain petitions which are being filed opposing the sale of former German ships, and which have been referred to the select committee to investigate the Shipping Board, be hereafter referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It seems to me that that is the proper committee to which they should go, as it has legislative jurisdiction, a thing that the select committee does not have. These petitions involve a matter which might possibly require legislation, and while the select committee is investigating certain phases of the matter which is the subject of the petitions, I am sure that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, presided over by my colleague [Mr. GREENE], is the proper committee to take cognizance of these matters.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question? Why not have those already sent to the select committee sent to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, so that that committee will have them all in one place?

Mr. WALSH. If this reference is made, it is my intention then to ask a rereference of those that have already been referred to the select committee to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he will follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts and in the future will so refer such petitions.

Mr. WALSH. Then I ask unanimous consent that certain petitions opposing the sale of these German ships which have been already referred to the committee to investigate the Shipping Board be rereferred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it not the practice to have all of these petitions referred under the guidance of the Speaker, so that the Speaker may refer them to the committees he thinks proper?

The SPEAKER. That is correct, and the Speaker, under that practice, has referred some of them to the committee on investigation, but the chairman of that committee having suggested that he thinks they should go to the other committee, the Speaker in the future will refer them to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I take it that under the rule the Member filing the petition makes the reference.

Mr. WALSH. The Member usually does.

The SPEAKER. These are petitions which are usually referred by the Member himself.

Mr. GARD. They may be sent, I suspect, where they are directed by the introducer of the petition.

The SPEAKER. When they are filed without any reference, then the Speaker, through the Clerk, refers them. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11960, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with Senate amendments, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire some information, if possible. It has been reported through the press that the President, through proper order, has made provision for entering into the United States of Mexican labor without passport fees or payment of the head tax to meet the agricultural emergency in Texas and possibly in some of the other States. I want to know whether that is an order that has any definiteness to it and upon which the people may depend. There is a great scarcity of labor in the State of Texas just now, and it is almost impossible for farmers and stockmen to get help of any kind, within any reasonable limit, both as to the required number of employees and wages demanded, and they would like to know what they may depend upon in the future. If the gentleman can give us any light on that subject, I would be glad to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit, I think this statement will answer the gentleman from Texas. The Secretary of Labor on February 12 in a very short order continued the regulations as they existed on January 1, 1920, lifting certain provisions of the law with regard to passports, head tax, and illiteracy with respect to laborers from contiguous territory coming into the border States and into Florida. The Secretary finds his authority under a certain provision which is found in the last part of section 3 of the present immigration laws.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is to last how long?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Until further notice—through this crop season, I imagine.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell me whether that applies to Canada?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It does. The order is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 12, 1920.

To the COMMISSIONER GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION:

Pending action by Congress on proposed legislation in re admission of laborers for agricultural pursuits to meet conditions such as are claimed to exist in States on the northern and southern borders and in the State of Florida, you are hereby directed, until further instructed, to put in force in States on said borders and in the State of Florida the regulations existing January 1, 1920, relating to the admission of laborers in States on the southern border and in Florida.

W. B. WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. BLANTON. Would not a proclamation of peace destroy that order?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think not. The order is issued on account of other than a war emergency.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts wants to know what this committee has to do with it. This particular bill has to do with passports, and said order would exempt Mexican laborers from paying the $10 per head, which means much to our Texas people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; it has nothing to do with that. The immigration law provides that the Secretary of Labor under certain conditions may remove these restrictions.

Mr. BLANTON. And we may expect that order to last through the present crop year. That is what our Texas people want.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. There is nothing in this bill that affects that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are some Senate amendments on this bill that I think are not entirely in harmony with the view the House has in respect to the matters affected. I feel confident that the conferees will give consideration to the views of the House in connection with those matters, and my own hope is that some of these amendments will not be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that a certain amendment in the bill provided for a charge of $10 a head for passports to those desiring to leave the United States, which, it is said, will raise quite a large sum of money. At the same time the Senate inserted amendments increasing the amount of appropriations $700,000, and I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs whether it is the intention of the conferees to permit this $700,000 to remain in the bill on the theory that the revenue received from the passport clause will meet these additional expenditures?

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of the conferees to carry out the intention of the House as expressed in the House bill and oppose any increase——

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, does the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Illinois provide that the moneys collected for the passports shall be turned into the Treasury or shall be kept by the State Department for expenditure?

Mr. PORTER. The money is paid directly into the Treasury.

Mr. GARNER. Then the question as to there being a profit from that to the State Department would not be taken into consideration?

Mr. MADDEN. No; the only question is whether or not the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House would feel that, inasmuch as the revenue was to be derived from that source, they would be more liberal in the matter of appropriations, and that is one of the things to which I am opposed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Mr. PORTER, Mr. ROGERS, and Mr. FLOOD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by former President Taft which appears in the papers this morning relative to the powers and duties of Cabinet officers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article by ex-President Taft appearing in the morning papers. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to direct the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to this request. Mr. Taft is quite prolific with his articles, as we all observe, in the morning newspapers. Now, I think it should be understood that where one of the articles of Mr. Taft tickles the fancy of some one on this side, and which probably takes a lick at somebody on that side, that he should be permitted to put it in the RECORD, and I merely call the attention of the gentleman to it at this time so that there will be no controversy in the future in reference to printing these articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that print paper is very scarce, and it costs a lot to print, and if they are going to print all of ex-President Taft's letters it will cause a very much larger shortage in print paper. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to my friend there seems to be some serious difference of opinion in certain quarters as to the rights and duties of Cabinet officers.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think there is much difference of opinion; if that is all, I would object——

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is for the illumination of the gentleman and the other Members of the House and for the information of the country.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that I read this article very hurriedly and there is one statement in there that shows that the ex-President evidently read the correspondence between the President and the Secretary of State very hurriedly, because there is a misstatement of fact. I know it is not intentional on the part of ex-President Taft. He has drawn a conclusion based upon that. I was going to compare it to-day, and I would not want it to go into the RECORD and be circulated if it is a misstatement of fact.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I submit the article for what it is worth. Of course, the gentleman would have opportunity, perhaps, later to correct any misapprehension.

Mr. WINGO. If we should undertake to refute all the misstatements of leading Republicans, public business would be impeded indefinitely, and for that reason I shall object for the present.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address of my own on Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by him on Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, is this the same address the gentleman from Indiana objected to the other day?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. I understand the gentleman delivered it before some organization of the Grand Army of the Republic?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I delivered it before the Grand Army of the Republic last Friday evening.

Mr. WINGO. I hope my friend will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Davey bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Davey bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I asked unanimous consent, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was in the chair last Saturday, to extend in the RECORD some telegrams from some cattlemen in my home county on the Agricultural bill. Some of those telegrams I did not get until yesterday, and I should like to ask permission to insert them in the RECORD now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] got unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a telegram, as I understand it, which he then had. Now, undoubtedly, the balance of these telegrams will probably be simply cumulative and to the same effect. I do not think at this late date we ought to fill up the RECORD with them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They are from some half dozen stockmen's associations, who urge the Committee on Agriculture to come there and examine the facts. They ask to have a hearing. The telegrams are not extensive at all. They set forth their conditions and the reasons why there should be no increase in the charge for grazing cattle on the forest reserves. The telegrams are to me from the most prominent stockmen in the State, whom I have known for many years, and I feel that the House should have the benefit of their judgment.

Mr. WALSH. It is dangerous to put telegrams in the RECORD inviting committees to visit——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did I understand the gentleman from Colorado to say that these telegrams he wishes to put in the RECORD are telegrams that the people in Colorado notified him they were going to send?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. How did they notify him? By mail?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They wired me, and then called the stockmen's meeting, and did not get around to sending them until after the bill had passed. I feel that they contain information the House and especially the Agricultural Committee ought to have.

Mr. WALSH. What information can the House get from these now, the bill having passed with the very amendment in there that most of them were interested in?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They want the House to know the conditions, and they want the committee to come there and investigate and hold a hearing. They present the matter very fairly, and I really feel that the telegrams ought to go in the RECORD. They are not lengthy at all and the question of grazing fees and the attempt to commercialize the grazing on the forest reserves is not settled by the passage of that bill. The cattlemen have got a right to be heard now or some time before the rights are adversely affected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two articles by Mr. Taft indorsing the League of Nations and asking the Republicans in the Senate to agree upon the treaty.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. To-day the Unanimous Consent Calendar is in order, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO OFFICERS OF THE COAST GUARD.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3202) granting leave of absence to officers of the Coast Guard, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant leave of absence without pay to such officer or officers of the United States Coast Guard as he may deem advisable, and to permit him or them to accept employment with the Venezuelan Government with such compensation and emoluments as may be agreed upon between the Venezuelan Government and such officer or officers thus granted leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the report on this bill is not very extensive. I was wondering whether the gentleman had supplemented it with any additional report; and if not, if he will advise us more particularly concerning the bill than appears in the small report as to what the bill is intended to do?

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have not supplemented it with any report. I will be glad to state what I know about the facts.

About a year ago the Venezuelan Government asked their minister here in Weshington to see if he could obtain from our Coast Guard an officer, and have him sent to the Venezuelan Government to act in the capacity of architectural director in the national navy yard at Puerto Cabello, and arrangements were made with the Navy Department, under which at that time the Coast Guard was being operated, it having been transferred from the Treasury Department to the Navy Department during the war, and an officer from the Coast Guard was detailed to go there. But they discovered there was no authority under which he could be transferred; that he would have to resign. Now, the Coast Guard officials were very anxious to keep this man in the service and keep all the men in the service that they had—these officers particularly. They did not want them to resign, and the request came from the Coast Guard itself to obtain authority under which they could allow one of these officers, or two of them, as the case might be, to be transferred to the Venezuelan Government, without pay, and transferred under leave of absence, so that at the end of their period of service of a few months or a year or so they might come back into the Coast Guard Service of our Government.

Now, this matter was submitted to the State Department, and the State Department recommended it. They recommended it because of some reasons that perhaps it might not be public policy to state here on the floor, but they thought if the Venezuelan Government wanted our officers there it might have a good influence over that Government and Governments in that locality to have one of them there. Not only that, but they thought it might be beneficial to both Governments if the Venezuelan Government could have the advantage of our system of conducting affairs in our Coast Guard.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand that one officer had already been detailed by the Navy Department and had given service to the Venezuelan Government in his capacity?

Mr. DALE. No, sir. He had not gone to the Venezuelan Government. Arrangements had been made for the transfer of this officer from our Coast Guard to the Venezuelan Government, but he did not go, because they discovered there was no authority under which it could be done.

Mr. GARD. How many officers is it contemplated to send down there?

Mr. DALE. At the present time it is contemplated to send only one officer; possible a little later two; but only one or two.

Mr. GARD. It seems there is some difficulty in keeping the best men under the naval appropriations now in the service. I had the idea that possibly this bill might be a little broad, inasmuch as it authorizes leave of absence to an officer or officers of the Coast Guard, placing it in the discretion of the President, possibly, to send more than should be sent, it resting in the discretion of some one.

Mr. DALE. I may be mistaken about this, but it is my impression that these officers are not under the Navy Department at all. They are under the Treasury Department.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. DALE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, during the war time the Coast Guard was transferred to the Navy Department and acted under the orders of that department. At the conclusion of military operations the officers of the Coast Guard were returned to the Treasury Department and are permanent officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GARD. In that event they are now under the Treasury Department?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes; they are now, an order having been issued for their return since the signing of the armistice.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DALE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Will this officer who goes down to Venezuela have to swear allegiance to the Venezuelan Government?

Mr. DALE. No; not at all. They go there under leave of absence. They draw no pay from this Government. They are paid by the Venezuelan Government. At the end of their service in Venezuela they come back here.

Mr. HICKS. Is the arrangement contemplated somewhat similar to the arrangement now in vogue in regard to our marines in the island of Haiti? As the gentleman knows, we have marines there who are a part of the gendarmery of Haiti, who are receiving pay from the United States Government and in addition are getting a stipend from the Haitian Government. They are, for all practical purposes, Haitian troops.

Mr. DALE. No; I understand the marines are acting in Haiti as station marines while they are there, and they are acting under a treaty. The matter was adjusted, as I understand it, by a treaty between this Government and the Government of Haiti.

Mr. HICKS. Will this officer detailed to Venezuela be a Venezuelan officer while on leave?

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALE. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. I think he is simply under contract with the Venezuelan Government, as a civil employee would be. We do not think he should be required to lose his place and rank in the service of the United States when he returns.

Mr. HICKS. He would not be a Venezuelan officer?

Mr. DALE. I understand not. I am very sure he simply goes as an instructor.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. DALE. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. These men in the Coast Guard Service now are the men who formerly constituted the Revenue-Cutter Service——

Mr. HICKS. And the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The Revenue-Cutter Service was a separate branch by itself. The Life-Saving Service was another special branch by itself. Those two divisions in the Treasury were consolidated under the title "Coast Guard Service." Now, these men who go are the men who belong to what we formerly designated as the Revenue-Cutter Service, and that service was the police force for the collection of customs duties as we all understand it.

Mr. DALE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] asked me some other question, I think, a while ago.

Mr. GARD. No; I did not ask any particular question. I asked to be enlightened concerning the report, and the gentleman has given information which has satisfied me.

Mr. DALE. I did not want to ignore the question. I would say that in discussing this matter with the Treasury Department the Treasury Department referred to the shortage of officers, to which the gentleman from Ohio has just made reference, and said they were very anxious for a bill of this kind to pass, because they thought it would prevent the resignation of these officers. They feared that the officers, if they were not given leave of absence under which they could take on this service temporarily, might be induced to leave the service. The inducement would be large enough from the Venezuelan Government to warrant their resigning from the service of our Government.

Mr. GARD. Would the gentleman be willing to accept as an amendment the insertion of the word "civil" in line 7, so that it would appear that they were accepting civil employment?

Mr. DALE. I think it would be civil employment. I have the impression that the insertion of the word "civil" would do no harm.

Mr. GARD. I suggest that because of the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] as affecting the status of these men if they leave the United States service to go into the service of Venezuela as officers of the navy, because that is practically what it amounts to. What is their international status?

Mr. DALE. Well, in their request for this officer they ask for an engineer of experience to accept an appointment in their navy yard at Puerto Cabello. Now, if they ask for an engineer to accept an appointment in the navy yard, I will say frankly to the gentleman from Ohio I do not know whether the word "civil" would be fatal to their object or not, but if not I have no objection to it.

Mr. GARD. My question was based on the inquiry of the gentleman from New York as to what would be the status of an American officer detailed to the Venezuelan Government and serving as an officer of the Venezuelan Navy in the navy yard.

Mr. DALE. I do not know whether it would be similar to the marines or not. I know that the marines are in the Haitian service, and they wear the Haitian uniform.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Coast Guard Service has control over what is really the Life-Saving Service and the Revenue-Cutter Service, I take it, and that is what I want to ask about. This man would be employed to help install or instruct in reference to the life-saving service, or probably the construction of small vessels used in the revenue service or coast-guard service of Venezuela. Is not that the purpose?

Mr. DALE. The gentleman from Illinois has stated the purpose for which these men are asked to go to Venezuela almost exactly as the request was made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They want an expert?

Mr. DALE. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We have plenty of experts?

Mr. DALE. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They want to borrow an expert for use in their coast-guard and life-saving service?

Mr. DALE. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not see why we should object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant leave of absence, without pay, to such officer or officers of the United States Coast Guard as he may deem advisable, and to permit him or them to accept employment with the Venezuelan Government with such compensation and emoluments as may be agreed upon between the Venezuelan Government and such officer or officers thus granted leave of absence.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FLATHEAD INDIAN ALLOTMENTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2454) for the relief of certain members of the Flathead Nation of Indians, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear from the gentleman in charge of the bill.

As I understand this bill it is proposed to allot to the Flathead Indian children, who have not heretofore received allotments, proportionate allotments in accordance with those that have already been made, and that 40 acres of each allotment shall be inalienable.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Just for information, knowing that this has been the custom in the past, what will happen when the land runs out and more children are born after that?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. There will be no further allotments made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I do not know. I think there have been some cases where in that event we were asked to buy land to make allotments or to furnish money compensation for lack of land. I believe this has been the practice for years. I never could see much justice in it, I am frank to say that. That is what it does, as I understand.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. That is what it does; yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is this character of legislation principally designed to benefit the children who were brought into the world after the original allotment or to encourage the parents to have more children?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit, this legislation is really in effect to move up the date of the making up of the roll, in order to take care of some after-born children. This is a Senate bill, but the representation made before the House Indian Committee was that there is plenty of land to take care of these children. If the land is not allotted to these children, there is some provision whereby it may be sold to settlers, and the department is very desirous of having these later-born Indian children take allotments before the lands are sold.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, as a matter of fact, where allotments have been to all of the Indians, including all the minors up to a certain date, the balance of the land belongs to the whole tribe, and if a sale of land is made it is for the benefit of the tribe. Then when we bring the allotment down to date we take the land away from those who do not have more children and practically give it to those who have large families of children.

Mr. HASTINGS. Answering the gentleman, of course the date as of which the roll was made up was an arbitrary date. Congress could have fixed any other date. If this change is made it will be because Congress believes that instead of fixing the former date the time ought to be moved up to the present date. The amount that would be received for this land if sold would be inconsiderable. If the land is allotted to the children, it goes to the various families anyhow, and I understand from the representations made to the department and by them to the committee that this is in the interest of the Indians, that the Indians want it, and that there is no protest from them. I understand also from representations made by members of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs that it is very desirable that this legislation should be enacted.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I remember how ardently my distinguished friend from Oklahoma the other day spoke in favor of the proposition to remove all restrictions from Indians——

Mr. HASTINGS. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whenever they become competent.

Mr. HASTINGS. With that condition; yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I usually state a thing fairly accurately when I get through. But here is a proposition which keeps the restrictions on, no matter how competent the Indian may become.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; but the gentleman from Illinois will also remember that in the last Indian appropriation bill we provided for three competency commissions. The purpose is to have these competency commissions go among the various Indian tribes, including this tribe, and to release the competent Indians in all the tribes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It will not release them in this case, because here is a provision in this bill, proposed by way of amendment, that 40 acres shall remain inalienable during the lifetime of the allottee. It does not make any difference how competent he may be, he can not sell the property, mortgage it, or otherwise dispose of it during his life. What does my distinguished friend from Oklahoma say about that after his ardent speech of the other day?

Mr. HASTINGS. I believe if any Indian is declared by a competency commission to be competent, and that is approved by the Secretary of the Interior, that Indian ought to be placed upon a plane with the white man. The gentleman asks me a question, and I make that frank answer.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What does the gentleman say, then, to this proposed amendment that 40 acres shall remain inalienable and nontaxable during the lifetime of the allottee? That will mean in some cases 70 or 80 years from now.

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion from me, I will say that that amendment ought to be changed so that the allottee would not have to come to Congress to get his restrictions removed, but it ought to be left with the Secretary of the Interior rather than with Congress to determine, because that is an administrative matter.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], then, is of the opinion that we ought not to put in a provision that certain property shall remain inalienable and nontaxable for 60 or 70 or 80 years, depending upon the length of the life of the allottee?

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I will tell him what I think ought to be done in this case. These are children born since the allotment was made. I think the allotments ought to be inalienable and nontaxable during their minority, and after that time I think the Secretary of the Interior should not be denied the right to remove restrictions, if they are found competent, after attaining their majority.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for me to ask a question of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. BEE. Would the gentleman accept an amendment that it should not be salable during minority, but after the man becomes of age, in case he is found competent, it may be sold?

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman knows that this is not my bill, but I think that would be a wholesome provision and ought to be placed in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was not raising objection against the views of gentlemen, but I think Congress ought to legislate along the same line on two bills which it considers on two successive days.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does it propose to do with children who are born during the year following the one year after the passage of this act?

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no provision made for that. Of course, they will not be allotted any land unless Congress makes provision for it.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but why should we take one group of children who have been born since the act of 1904 and permit a year to elapse after the passage of this law, and then say now these children who are unfortunate enough to be born after that time will have to be treated on a different basis?

Mr. HASTINGS. I can not answer the gentleman. This is a Senate bill passed by the Senate, sent over to the House, and referred to the Indian Committee. The representation was made to the Indian Committee that there is plenty of land to allot to these children and that it is desirable to have it allotted to the Indian children rather than to be taken up by white settlers, in which event only a small amount would be paid.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that there are 600 children and 25,000 acres of land. They propose to give them 40 acres each, which will take up 24,000 acres. I was wondering why this particular group of 600 children are proposed to benefit from this legislation at this particular time. Why not look to the future, if this is a good policy, which I doubt; why not enact a broad, general law which will take care of the children as they come along?

Mr. HASTINGS. It might be, although I can not answer specifically, that as to the other Indian reservations there would not be sufficient land. But here there will be no charge whatever on the Government, because there happens to be plenty of land to allot to the children.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman believe that we are doing these children a benefit by passing this sort of legislation?

Mr. HASTINGS. I certainly do. It provides a home for them, and I think to provide a home for Indian children is much better than to give them the small amount that would be paid by the settlers for these lands.

Mr. WALSH. To permit them to have these 40 acres the gentleman thinks will tend to make them self-supporting, useful members of the community?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think it would be much better than to give them the equivalent in money. We are all hoping it will tend to make them self-supporting.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma. I notice in the report made by a commission to investigate irrigation projects on Indian lands that that report states that there are lands on the Flathead Reservation which should be permanently reserved for forestry purposes in order to protect the watershed and a number of streams, the saving of which is needed to irrigate Indian lands. Then, in answer to an inquiry made by the chairman, it was stated that if such is the case it would seem to be against the interest of the Flathead Indians to allow such lands to pass into private ownership, either to the settlers under the homestead law or by allotment to the Indians.

I notice that the Secretary of the Interior stated:

In view of the fact that in all probability the land which may be selected for watershed protection will consist largely of the mountainous part of the reservation, and that there is no probability that any Indian or homesteader will desire an allotment on such lands as the Forestry Service would use as a national forest, I do not see any good reason why action on Senate bill 2454 should be deferred until the commission indicated has made its report.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I was going to call attention to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would it not be better to provide that no allotments should be made where it would interfere with the watershed protection and irrigation?

My observation in the world is that where somebody can get something of very small value which will interfere with other things of very large value, that he frequently does it in order to be bought out. Why not protect against that?

Mr. HASTINGS. That very question was raised before the Indian Committee by some of the western Members who are very familiar with the question that the gentleman from Illinois raises, and the bill went over for some time for further investigation. The department made the representation—I do not have the report before me and have not refreshed my memory from it—but I remember that the department made certain representations to the committee that there would be sufficient land to allot to the minor children without taking these lands necessary to protect the watershed referred to by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Secretary says that there is no probability that any Indian or homesteader will desire an allotment of such lands as the Forestry Service would use as a national forest. It would seem to me the better way to do would be to protect that by a provision in the bill and not leave it to the probability of what some man wants, when his wants might interfere very materially with the interests of the tribe or of the Government.

Mr. HASTINGS. The department thought it could do it by regulation, by administration, and that it would have the power to do it by administration.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They do not indicate it in this report.

Mr. HASTINGS. I know certain representations were made to the committee to that effect, and that induced us to report it favorable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been considering the precedents, and he finds that it was held some years ago that when the House gave unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill it thereby dispensed with consideration of it under the Union Calendar. The Chair is disposed to follow that precedent, unless the House would rule otherwise..

Mr. WALSH. If that be so, then what is the difference between considering a bill by unanimous consent and suspending the rules?

The SPEAKER. There is this difference: This does not require a two-thirds vote, and, furthermore, the bill may be amended when it is considered under unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And it requires unanimous consent to have it considered. Mr. Speaker, for a great many years it was the practice of the House, where a bill was on the Union Calendar and unanimous consent was given for its consideration, to consider the bill in the House. For some years after that, while Mr. CLARK was Speaker, he held that it still required unanimous consent to dispense with the consideration of the bill by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If the Speaker announces his ruling on the subject, that, I think, disposes of it. We will know then that if unanimous consent be given, the bill is not to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, although I suppose a request might be made for unanimous consent to consider the bill without interfering with the right to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if any Member desires to go into the Committee of the Whole House he could state that and give unanimous consent only upon the condition that the bill would be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the period of one year from and after the approval of this act the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, under existing law and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to make allotments on the Flathead Reservation, Mont., to all unallotted living children enrolled with the tribe, enrolled or entitled to enrollment: Provided, That such allotments be made from any unallotted or unsold lands within the original limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, including the area now classified and reserved as timber lands, cut-over lands, burned or barren lands thereon; and patents issued for allotments hereunder for any lands from which such timber has not been cut and marketed shall contain a clause reserving to the United States the right to cut and market, for the tribal benefit, as now authorized by law, the merchantable timber on the lands so allotted: Provided further, That when the merchantable timber has been cut from any lands allotted hereunder the title to such timber as remains on such lands will thereupon pass to the respective allottees, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to withhold from sale or entry all lands unsold and unentered within the said reservation at the date of the passage of this act until allotments hereunder have been completed. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 14 and 15, after the word "completed," strike out "All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed" and insert: "Provided, That not exceeding 40 acres of each allotment made under the provisions of this act shall be designated as a homestead, which shall be inalienable and nontaxable during the lifetime of the allottee unless otherwise provided by Congress and so evidenced in the patents issued for said allotments."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "the" in the committee amendment, strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "minority of the allottee and thereafter until such restrictions may be removed either by Congress or the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be reported as it will read if this be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as it would read if the amendment to the amendment were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That not exceeding 40 acres of each allotment made under the provisions of this act shall be designated as a homestead, which shall be inalienable and nontaxable during the minority of the allottee and thereafter until such restrictions may be removed either by Congress or the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to be heard upon his amendment?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question. What is the idea in giving this alternative power to the Secretary of the Interior or to Congress? Under the provision which is on the Indian appropriation bill I take it that upon the report of these competency commissions the Secretary of the Interior could remove these restrictions.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. That being so, what is the necessity of putting in the words "by Congress"? Congress could do it anyway.

Mr. CARTER. Both Congress and the Secretary have the right to remove restrictions now and both perform that function quite often. Only a few days ago we passed a bill through the House known as the citizenship bill, by which these restrictions were removed by Congress from persons of less than half Indian blood. The words were placed there simply to conform to existing law and in order to show that Congress was not abdicating any right it had to remove restrictions. It would have that right anyway.

Mr. WALSH. Just to let these people know that if the Secretary of the Interior would not do it, then some enterprising Member of Congress from that locality would be glad to bring in such a measure?

Mr. CARTER. That might be true, though I had not that in mind, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. No; but I was wondering what was the necessity of putting in the words "by Congress."

Mr. CARTER. It was simply in order to show that no change was made in existing law with reference to the power of Congress in that regard.

Mr. WALSH. But we do change the existing law by providing that the Secretary of the Interior may remove the restriction.

Mr. CARTER. The Secretary of the Interior now has the right to remove the restrictions and so has Congress. We simply propose that we shall do in the future with reference to these things after these children become 21 years of age the same thing we are proposing to do now, but that until they become 21 years of age their lands shall remain nontaxable and inalienable. When it comes to taxation of Indian lands, the courts have held that after an Indian has been given land with a nontaxable status recited in the deed, the lands can not then be made taxable by Congress, until that nontaxable period expires. I think if we put this specific provision in the bill reserving to Congress and the Interior Department the right to remove restrictions after he attains his majority, that would obviate this perpetual continuation of the nontaxable status of the lands after he becomes of age.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that the language here employed would require the Secretary of the Interior to act only after these competency commissions should consider the matter in accordance with the requirements in the annual Indian appropriation act, or will it give him the power to act without having it referred to him?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would not have any reference to that, because it runs out before this takes effect.

Mr. CARTER. The Secretary, under existing law, has two methods of removing restrictions. One is by filing application with the local agent that comes on down through the Indian Bureau to the Secretary. The other is by a competency commission, to which the gentleman has just alluded. I do not think this will interfere with either of those.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I just came on the floor, and I desire to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma whether or not the amendment he proposes changes in any way, substantially, the bill as it has been reported?

Mr. CARTER. It changes the committee amendment, I will say to the gentleman. I did not see him on the floor or I would have consulted with him——

Mr. RHODES. I just came on the floor.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman will notice the committee amendment provides that these lands shall be inalienable and not taxable during the lifetime of the allottee, unless otherwise provided for by Congress. That would not mean, perhaps, that Congress has not the right in the future to provide that the Secretary of the Interior might remove these restrictions, but it is a specific legal statement which might cause litigation as to taxation. I thought, after these children attained their majority, that it would not be consistent policy to preclude the Secretary from removing restrictions from the competent ones among them, just as we do with others at the present time, and for that reason the amendment was proposed. It was brought out by the suggestions of the gentleman from Illinois, who called attention to the fact that this was inconsistent with the policy that we had been pursuing.

Mr. RHODES. I would like to ask the gentleman one further question. The gentleman is aware of the fact that this bill was held under consideration for some considerable time pending the request by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SNYDER] of the Secretary of the Interior for his approval or disapproval of this measure?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. Now, does the gentleman's amendment meet the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, I have not consulted with him. I feel sure he would not oppose it. It does not change the existing law with reference to the matter. It leaves the fixed policy of the Government with reference to these Indians the same as with all other Indians.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I do, if I have the floor.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think it has not been the policy of the Congress to make an allotment of Indian lands to an allottee and then provide in no case it shall be taxed or disposed of within the lifetime of the allottee. In this case allotments are to be made to children, some of whom will be born after the bill is passed, and make their 40 acres nontaxable and inalienable for a lifetime, which may be 40, 50, or 70, or 80 years in some cases. It never has been the policy of Congress to do that, I think. We did get quite tied up by the treaty in the Oklahoma cases with reference to taxation and then we could not change the nontaxable provisions. I called attention to this when the bill came up under the reservation of the right to object.

Mr. RHODES. May I state, Mr. Speaker, in response to the suggestion by the gentleman from Illinois, that this request came before the committee from a lady residing on the reservation, who had some personal interest in the tribe, and, as I understand, her objections were first made known to the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate and then to the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House. Then the whole matter was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and after the matter was considered by the Secretary, I think he filed quite a lengthy report or a letter approving the proposition, and the committee accepted the suggestion as being proper and right in the case. We may not have acted with full knowledge, but——

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit, if the gentleman will read the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, I feel perfectly sure he will have no objection to it, because it continues the restriction and makes the land inalienable and nontaxable during minority or until Congress acts or the Secretary acts. That is the substance of it.

Mr. CARTER. I will say to the gentleman I have it here and I will read it——

Mr. RHODES. That will perhaps meet the question I raised, but may not meet the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, yes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I think if we will read it, it will expedite it. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk again report the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the Clerk report the committee amendment as amended, and I ask unanimous consent to change my amendment by adding the word "further" after the word "Provided."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the modification is agreed to. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER to the committee amendment: Page 2, line 18, after the word "the," in the committee amendment, strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert "minority of the allottee, and thereafter until such restrictions may be removed either by Congress or the Secretary of the Interior," so that as amended the committee amendment will read:

"Provided further, That not exceeding 40 acres of each allotment made under the provisions of this act shall be designated as a homestead, which shall be inalienable and nontaxable during the minority of the allottee and thereafter until such restrictions may be removed either by Congress or the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. RHODES. I believe I like that better than the original form.

Mr. CARTER. That conforms to the policy.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amndment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RHODES, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WATER-SUPPLY OF LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 406) amending an act entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California; and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, California, to the city of Los Angeles, Calif.," approved June 30, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think this is one of the bills that ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and unless it is I shall object to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which, I take it after examination, is of very considerably broader scope than appears under the title of the bill, directing and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands in the city of Los Angeles, Calif., for water purposes. I am calling the attention, first, of those who are proponents of the bill—and I do not desire to object unless it be necessary in the process of orderly legislation—to the letter of October 21, 1919, in which Assistant Secretary Riggs, of the Department of Agriculture, says:

Should a bill such as the general water-power bill which has passed the House and is now before the Senate be enacted, there will be no need of enacting special legislation to enable the city of Los Angeles to secure the rights of way which it requires for the completion of its power-development plan.

My understanding is, as the Secretary says, this water-power measure has passed the House and is now in conference between the Senate and House conferees, and I am asking, first, why the necessity now of pursuing this special legislation?

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman will notice that in the following sentence of the report of Mr. Riggs it is stated that it does not appear under the provisions of the present bill that the city would obtain concessions inconsistent either with existing general legislation or with the legislation proposed under the water-power bill. I would take that to mean that, even if the water-power bill passed, the department would have no objections to the passage of the present bill, inasmuch as the matter would be only in the nature of duplication.

Now, I believe that it would be better to amend the act of 1906, as we do in the present bill, than it would be to rely on the water-power bill, which may never pass. If the gentleman will look at the present bill, he will see it merely amends the basic act in two or three sections and in particulars that are vital to the interests of the city.

Mr. GARD. It amends it in very radical detail, I am frank to say. It appears, and I have information to that effect, that it makes the reservation of practically 2,000,000 acres of land to the city of Los Angeles for a practically undetermined time. In the second place, it seeks to give official legislative sanction to the occupancy of a right of way which is extended from possibly some feet off of the right of way heretofore granted for a mile and a half. Of course, I understand the extension was made necessary by certain features which required the going away from the right of way heretofore granted and extending laterally beyond. But it involves a very considerable inquiry into what public lands are held in abeyance. Besides, it involves many questions in the department as to hydroelectric powers, with rights of usage by the city and rights of usage by persons who have cross lines. It involves also the questions of irrigation, which are very vital in the gentleman's State. And I think, in view of all these matters, it is not such a bill as should be considered upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. ELSTON. I would like the gentleman to continue the discussion in this provisional way before he makes up his mind, because I think, with the knowledge he appears to have of the bill, he can be brought to see that it is a most important bill for the interests of the city of Los Angeles, and that if it passes it can not prejudice in any way any of the interests which the gentleman has mentioned.

The gentleman has mentioned irrigation interests and other interests that might be affected by what he calls this blanket reservation. Representatives of all these interests appeared before the committee, and I think the report states that those representatives and the interests affected are well satisfied with this bill.

I would plead with the gentleman to reserve his objection for a while, in order to afford further explanation of any matters he thinks are still in doubt.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Would the gentleman object to adding a new section to the bill providing that the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act be expressly reserved?

Mr. ELSTON. There would be no question of that. As I recall, I think section 7 of the original act contains such a provision.

Mr. WALSH. It does, but that would not make it apply to a new section added to the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As a matter of fact, the city has already spent something like $30,000,000, and is to spend some $20,000,000. They could not have a revocable permit and spend all that money on it.

Mr. WALSH. By a new section of this bill we are expressly making an additional grant, and Congress should not do that without reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not when the city has got to spend all this money on it.

Mr. WALSH. Without that in the bill you can not get it by here.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is in the original act.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but it would not apply to the new section.

Mr. SINNOTT. It would still be left intact.

Mr. WALSH. I differ with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If it is in the original act what objection is there to putting it in the amendatory act?

Mr. WALSH. That is what I am asking.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen would discuss this matter for a moment I think——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Under the reservation, I presume I am entitled to the floor. I would like the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] or the other gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE] to further explain the bill.

Mr. ELSTON. In regard to the blanket reservation that was contained in the original act, the effect of the present amendment is to curtail rather than enlarge this reservation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to discuss the merits of this bill simply to satisfy one or two questions under a reservation of a point of order. It seems to me the merits ought to be discussed in the regular way. If the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] raises one or two objections I have no objection to the gentleman from California trying to explain away the gentleman's objection, but to go into the entire merits of the bill under a reservation of a point of order does not seem to me to be exactly regular.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that is just what the gentleman from California is doing.

Mr. WALSH. He will not do it very long if his colleague from California begins to ask questions. I do not demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. The question deals with irrigation and homesteads, affecting all this territory. A year ago the parties came here, and they are satisfied, I understand, with the provisions of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. ELSTON. I so stated to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. RAKER. So as to protect the city of Los Angeles as well as the homesteaders and any irrigationists who may desire to go in and develop water for irrigation.

Mr. ELSTON. That is the fact. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire a further explanation of the bill?

Mr. GARD. I do. If the gentleman desires to answer my question, I will be pleased to have him do it. If there is a demand for the regular order, I shall object.

Mr. ELSTON. If the gentleman would reserve that still, I would state that there was an original act passed in 1906 to enable the city of Los Angeles to take water from the Owens River and conduct it 240 miles to the city of Los Angeles. The intervening country is barren and largely desert land. It is not agricultural country at all. The bill gave the city of Los Angeles—I am speaking of the original bill—a blanket permit to lay out its conduits and construct its works over a territory as extensive as the territory mentioned in this bill.

The city entered upon the work and laid out in money something like $32,000,000 in constructing the works under the authority of the original bill passed in 1906. The time for completion fixed in the original bill of 1906 was not sufficient. It was a tremendous undertaking, one of the greatest ever undertaken by any municipality in the world's history. It took more than the time limited in the bill for them to construct their works and additions thereto.

One of the main objects of the present bill is to extend that time limitation over the same territory granted in the original bill. Now, the other object, as the gentleman has stated, is to correct the alignment of the aqueduct from the surveyed line accepted by the Secretary of the Interior. That survey was made, and it was found in the actual construction of the aqueduct, over 240 miles in length, that divergencies from the surveyed line had to be made. These divergencies varied from a few feet to probably less than a mile. I do not believe that any divergence exceeds a mile in width. This bill has for its object the validating of that divergence in the matter of the alignment of the aqueduct. The present bill is more restrictive of the rights of the city of Los Angeles than the old bill was. In amendment No. 1, mentioned in the conference report, and incorporated in section 2 of the bill, the gentleman will see that the rights of all other interests are protected. That includes the rights of power men, irrigationists, and any kind of interests that might want to go into that extensive territory for the purpose of obtaining rights of way.

The amendment to section 2 protects those people absolutely, gives them the right to a hearing, and the right to obtain rights of way. It further grants the privilege in this amendment of crossing the works of the city at any place; and it goes further than that. It not only gives the right of crossing but also of joint use for a certain limited distance, so that any other applicant could make application and be granted the right to use part of the city's works.

I think if the gentleman will read the present bill, he will see that it rather restricts the very extensive powers granted to the city in the original act.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Page 6, lines 19 to 25 of the bill read as follows:

Provided, That the lands affected hereby shall be subject to applications for homesteads, for rights of way for canals, ditches, or reservoirs, for the conveyance, delivery, or storage of water for irrigation, if same be filed in the proper United States land office prior to the filing of maps by the city of Los Angeles, showing the boundaries, location, and extent of the rights of way sought by said city.

The city of Los Angeles in its prior hearing upon the former bill, as well as in the hearing on this bill, was satisfied with and agreed to that provision of the bill without any question, to the end that homesteaders as well as irrigationists in that country shall be protected. Is that correct?

Mr. ELSTON. I think that is correct, and that answers fully the misgivings expressed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RAKER. I understand from our colleague, Capt. OSBORNE, who is also present with me now, that that is the position of the city of Los Angeles, and that they are perfectly willing to carry out this provision which I have just read.

Mr. OSBORNE. That is absolutely true.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that two years ago this same legislation was under consideration in S. 4023. The House amended the bill by inserting these provisions. The farmers and others in Inyo County came here and spent a month or two, and after many weeks of work the city of Los Angeles agreed to this amendment. They also came on this year, claiming that it involved 250,000 acres of irrigable land in another place, and as I understand it these parties are agreed and satisfied that this provision will protect them, and that it is proper legislation, and further that the amendment suggested by the committee on page 4, commencing with line 17, not only protects those who are there now, but those who may hereafter desire to file applications for water rights to irrigate some 250,000 acres of land.

This bill goes further than any bill that has ever been presented to the House, in that the right of way granted to the city of Los Angeles can not be exclusive, but that irrigationists and others who apply to the Secretary of the Interior can use it, so that the land can be used for both irrigating and power purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Upon what does the gentleman base his statement that this right of way will not be exclusive?

Mr. RAKER. Commencing on page 4, line 17.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that that does not give the city an exclusive right of way, in view of other language in the bill?

Mr. RAKER. It is exclusive after they get it; yes. In other words, third parties make an application for a right of way, a reservoir, etc. They file their application. The Secretary of the Interior then notifies the city of Los Angeles. The city of Los Angeles comes forward with its application, and the Secretary of the Interior can say, "You shall both use this right of way for the benefit of everybody;" but if it interfered with or prevented the city of Los Angeles from completing and properly developing its right of way, why, of course, the application would have to be denied and ought to be denied, because they have been at work there for the last 12 years and have expended in the neighborhood of $32,000,000. They have a canal 240 miles long.

Mr. WALSH. That comes very near being an exclusive right.

Mr. RAKER. It is, under those circumstances.

Mr. WALSH. Well, under any circumstances.

Mr. RAKER. It would have to be exclusive under those circumstances.

Mr. SINNOTT. Is not the gentleman stating the case too strongly against the city?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. That is not exclusive at all. Under the provision on page 5, anybody can come along, even after a hundred years, and run anything he pleases over this right of way.

Mr. RAKER. I said it was exclusive after it was granted, but not before. But the Secretary of the Interior is given an opportunity to adjust this matter, better than in any grant that has ever come before this House.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman calls our attention to line 17, page 4, but he does not read the proviso on line 9, page 5.

Mr. RAKER. That is the same proviso.

Mr. WALSH. It happens to be another proviso.

Mr. RAKER. It says:

Provided further, That all rights of way herein and hereby granted and all other rights of way hereafter granted under general laws, for the purposes herein enumerated, over lands within the operation of this act, shall be with the reservation of the power to thereafter grant other rights of way by easement or permit, conflicting with such prior grants or permits for the purpose of permitting crossing of rights of way or for limited distances necessary common use of prior rights of way, under such conditions as the head of the department shall find necessary and shall determine to be properly protective against interference with and not detrimental to the construction, operation, and maintenance of the works of prior grantees or permittees.

And I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact——

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman now say—that it is exclusive or that it is not exclusive?

Mr. RAKER. It is not exclusive, of course.

Mr. WALSH. Which department does this refer to in this "provided further"?

Mr. RAKER. Both.

Mr. WALSH. Where it says—

Under such conditions as the head of the department shall find necessary?

Mr. RAKER. The two departments. Where the land is public land it goes to the Secretary of the Interior, and where it is national-forest land it goes to the Secretary of Agriculture, and there are both kinds of land in this grant.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON]—not that I doubt the interpretation of the distinguished gentleman from California, Mr. RAKER—but in view of his explanation of this question, he having taken both positions on the matter, I would like to resolve a doubt that exists in my mind by asking the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] if he agrees with his colleague that this refers to the heads of two different departments. I am referring to the language, line 17, page 5, "such conditions as the head of the department shall find necessary and shall determine to be properly protective against interference with and not detrimental to the construction, operation, and maintenance of the works," and so forth.

Mr. ELSTON. It is my impression that most of the applications will be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, and most of the approvals made by him. It is, however, a fact that a great deal of this land is covered by forest reserves, and, to the extent that rights of way are asked over the forest reserves, there would have to be some approval made by the Secretary of Agriculture. To that extent it would require the approval of the heads of the two departments.

Mr. RAKER. Page 2, line 1, grants the right of way over public lands and over reserves; so there are two heads of departments that must deal with the rights of way. There are two laws governing the subject, one granting jurisdiction to the Secretary of Agriculture over forest reserves and the other granting jurisdiction to the Secretary of the Interior over public lands.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be of vital importance to the public, although the city of Los Angeles is mostly interested. I have not yet been satisfied that this bill should be considered on this calendar, and, in view of the extent of the holding back of lands made necessary by it, in view of the extensions of right of way, in view of the desire of the city apparently to create a tremendous water-power control out there, with little or no Government supervision and with no compensation, I am constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY ON HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN THE FORMER COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 194, amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know how this joint resolution comes to be reported from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. This bill was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CARTER. It provides for extending payment on moneys which are to be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of certain Indians, a matter over which the Committee on the Public Lands has no jurisdiction in the world. The jurisdiction is clearly with the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Public Lands Committee should have taken notice of that.

Mr. SINNOTT. There was considerable question in the committee among members as to jurisdiction. The Committee on the Public Lands has more work than it can attend to, and we have no desire to enlarge its jurisdiction. But as the matter was explained to us the Indians have no interest in these lands.

Mr. CARTER. This does not deal with the lands; it deals with payment of moneys which belong to Indians.

Mr. SINNOTT. This is public land, and the Indians are reimbursed by the Federal Government. The Government reimburses itself by the sale of these lands.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is mistaken. These were surplus Indian lands left over after the allotments were made on the Colville Reservation and then sold under the homestead law.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the way it was explained to us, and it was further shown to the committee that this was a real emergency matter. We hoped that the question would not be raised.

Mr. CARTER. That may be true, but bills ought to go to the proper committee. The Indian Committee appropriates every year from funds of these very Colville Indians for administration purposes. I do not know how the funds stand to-day; but assume that next year on account of this extension the Colville Indians have no money in the Treasury. What will Congress do? Will it refuse to appropriate for the agency? No; it will appropriate from the Treasury to carry on the activities, a thing which would not be done if the Indians had funds for administration purposes. So it may be that we are, by the passage of this bill, saddling an unnecessary and unfair expense on the Federal Treasury.

I have read the report, and I note that the Secretary's letter does not say a word as to whether these funds will be necessary for the upkeep of the agency next year. If the bill had come before the Committee on Indian Affairs, that would have been one of the first questions brought out, because the Committee on Indian Affairs has upon it the duty and responsibility of looking after these Indians, providing funds for their administration, which the Committee on the Public Lands has not. I think these bills ought to go to the proper committee. I dislike very much to object to this bill, but I gave notice on the last unanimous-consent day when a bill came in from Montana similar to this that unless the jurisdiction of the committee were more properly observed I should be constrained to object.

Mr. Speaker, on account of the statement made by the gentleman from Washington I am not going to object, but I can not stand here any longer and permit these things to go on in such manner as this, which lets a man in at the back door when he can not get in at the front door. I shall not object this time, but I will give notice that I shall object in the future.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the bill reported before unanimous consent for its consideration is given.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.," approved March 11, 1918, be, and it is hereby, amended by making the period of extension to be granted by the Secretary of the Interior three years instead of one year, but subject to all other conditions of said resolution.

With a committee amendment striking out all of page 1, after the enacting clause, from lines 3 to 10, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.," approved March 11, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to extend for a period of one year the time for the payment of any annual installment due, or hereafter to become due, of the purchase price for lands sold under the act of Congress approved March 22, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 80), entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes,' and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made: Provided further, That any and all payments must be made when due unless the entryman applies for an extension and pays interest for one year in advance at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due, as herein provided, and patent shall be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made in accordance with the provisions hereof: And provided further, That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended as herein provided, shall forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to get a little further information in respect to this matter, though I dislike to take up the time, for I understand it is an emergency proposition. What is the effect of the proviso beginning in line 15, on page 2, in the committee amendment, that the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made, and what effect has that on the language immediately preceding to the effect that any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner? As I understand it, they can keep extending these payments for one year and indefinitely postpone the time of the last payment.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] is more familiar with this than anyone else.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They all have to come within the time fixed for the last payment.

Mr. SINNOTT. I understand that to mean that it can not be extended beyond the date of the last payment mentioned in the act.

Mr. WALSH. What does this extension granted in lines 14 and 15 apply to—

And any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner.

Mr. SINNOTT. For one year in the same manner, but in no event longer than the time of the ultimate payment mentioned in the act.

Mr. CARTER. Longer than one year after that.

Mr. SINNOTT. One year after that.

Mr. WALSH. I shall not object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk again reported the resolution with the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion."

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

REFERRING CERTAIN INDIAN CLAIMS IN STATE OF WASHINGTON TO COURT OF CLAIMS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 157) authorizing the Indian tribes and individual Indians, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington and west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains to submit to the Court of Claims certain claims growing out of treaties and otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported first.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all claims of whatsoever nature, both legal and equitable, of the tribes and bands of Indians, or any of them, with whom any of the treaties of Medicine Creek, dated December 26, 1854; Point Elliott, dated January 22, 1855; Point-no-Point, dated January 26, 1855; the Quin-ai-elts, dated May 8, 1859, growing out of said treaties, or any of them, including claims for allotments of land, or the value thereof, which they failed to receive under any of said treaties; and that all claims of whatever nature, both legal and equitable, which the Muckelshoot, San Juan Island Indians; Nook-Sack Chinook, Upper Chehalis, Lower Chehalis, and Humptulip Tribes or Bands of Indians, or any of them (with whom no treaty has been made), may have against the United States shall be submitted to the Court of Claims, with right of appeal by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States for determination and jurisdiction, both legal and equitable, is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine any and all suits brought hereunder and to render final judgment therein: Provided, That the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States shall not extend to those tribes or bands of Indians, or any of them, with whom no treaty has been made: Provided further, That the court shall also consider and determine any legal or equitable defenses, setoffs, or counter claims which the United States may have against any of said tribes, bands, or individual Indians.

SEC. 2. That the Court of Claims shall advance the cause or causes upon its docket for hearing, and shall have authority to determine and adjudge all rights and claims, both legal and equitable, of said Indians, tribes or bands of Indians, or any of them, and of the United States in the premises, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitation.

SEC. 3. That suit or suits instituted hereunder shall be begun within five years from the date of the passage of this act by such Indians, tribe, tribes, or bands of Indians, as parties plaintiff, and the United States as the party defendant. The petition or petitions may be verified by attorney or attorneys employed by such tribes or Indians upon information and belief as to the facts therein alleged, and no other verification shall be necessary: Provided, That the attorney or attorneys of said tribes or bands of Indians, or any of them, shall be selected by the claimant Indian or Indians with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and upon final determination of such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to fix and determine a reasonable fee, not to exceed 10 per cent of the recovery, to be paid to the attorneys employed by the said tribes or bands of Indians, or any of them, and the same shall be included in the decree and shall be paid out of any sum or sums found to be due said tribes.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the word "Island" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Islands."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there seems to be nothing in the report which would indicate the character of any claims which may be made in behalf of these Indians—nothing as to how many claims there are or how many may be involved in the claims. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], who made the report, any information on that subject?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman's inquiry, I would say that we did hold a hearing before the Indian Affairs Committee on this Senate bill and went into those matters. The bill provides for adjudicating the claims of certain tribes and bands in the State of Washington, west of the Cascade Mountains, that had entered into treaties with the United States Government, and providing for certain tribes and bands that did not enter into treaties. The original agreement in four different treaties, in 1854, 1855, and 1859, provided for the allotment of lands to these Indians, and the treaties were made on the understanding that each Indian would receive a home. When the final allotment was made the Indians received 7 acres each, not sufficient to provide a home. These Indians ceded lands to the Government which would average 1,800 acres each, and this land was used for homestead purposes and was largely settled by white settlers. The Indians made their claims and the response came that there were no lands for them whatever. They claim now they are entitled to the allotments the treaty agreement contemplated. The tribes and bands which never entered into treaty agreement say that, in all justice, they are entitled to a day in court also. The amount of the claims of those tribes and bands having treaty agreements is estimated at $150,000, and the number of persons involved is 2,400 or thereabout.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If there are 2,000 persons involved and they are each to have a homestead of 80 acres, it certainly would amount to more than $150,000.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I will say that other public lands have been set aside, but no action can be taken until a measure of this kind is passed, as I understand it. Much of this land is timberland. If it were allotted, there is land enough to almost provide the allotment for all the Indians concerned.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. These timberlands are rather valuable.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. They are; and that is the reason the Government has not made any arrangement for the allotment of the lands. However, the claims of the Indians should be adjudicated on a fair basis, regardless of the timber question involved.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It may be; I will not say that it is not; I do not know anything about it; but there are very few of these claims that some enterprising attorney has not dug up by this time. The matter has been pending for years and the Department of the Interior does not seem to have very much information about the bill. If they have, they have kept it to themselves.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will admit that these Indians are entitled to all that the treaties allowed them at the time the Government made its agreement?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I do not admit that as a matter of right anybody has the right to sue the Government of the United States for both legal and what he may consider equitable claims; far from it. The Government concedes the right now for people to sue where they have legal claims. I suppose these people have no legal claim; I do not know.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There are legal claims under treaty stipulations.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If they are legal claims, that is one thing. But that is not what they seek. They always come in with a provision for the right to sue for what they call equitable claims, and nobody knows what an equitable claim is, and I think that we ought to know something about the character of the claim which we pass by special legislation and submit to the Court of Claims. I do not recall any instance before where we gave a blanket authority to sue the Government of the United States in the Court of Claims without information as to the character of the claim and, to some extent at least, the amount which may be involved. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania states in his opinion $150,000 may be involved here.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That was the estimate before the committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And four treaties may be involved; yet the bill covers a great deal further than that, and it is not confined even to treaties.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HADLEY. With reference to the estimate stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if the gentleman will refer to the hearings the estimate is that $150,000 will be the aggregate of claims, as nearly as can be ascertained, growing out of the treaties only. However, it will be observed that the bill covers a number of tribes and bands that did not negotiate and were not included under the treaties. Now, apparently no one is able to state with certainty or satisfactory definiteness just what the aggregate of all the claims would amount to, because the department itself upon inquiry has made a statement substantially to that effect, which was in the record at the time of the hearings. Naturally that would be so unless there had been a very full survey in the case of each individual Indian, of whom it appears by the testimony there are 2,000 or more, because it would involve an estimate as to the amount paid and the amount which had been promised and the amount, as the gentleman suggests, which would be equitably due in consideration of depriving the Indians of their homes. The Indians had little homes at the time these treaties were negotiated and cleared up, tracts upon which they raised potatoes and other vegetables. When the white settlers came upon the scene they traded with them and they ceded, as was stated, about 1,800 acres, on the average, to the Government under these treaties with the understanding——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Did they get paid for it?

Mr. HADLEY. I understand not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Upon what did they cede?

Mr. HADLEY. The land.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I dare say there never was an Indian treaty made yet that did not purport to pay compensation for any land ceded by any Indian of the United States. The gentleman here says that is not in the treaty. I would like to have somebody look up the treaty first.

Mr. HADLEY. The treaty provided for the payment of all improvements, and there were some improvements upon these lands.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Government of the United States has never undertaken, as far as I have ever been able to discover, to take lands away from Indians without making any compensation.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will read the hearings he will see this answer to his contention. Here is the statement of Mr. Griffin, who represented the Indians.

> Now, at the time these treaties were made the Oregon donation act was in effect. They were then giving to a single white man a half section of land and to a married man and his wife a full section of land in Oregon and Washington Territory, and those Indians ceded an average of 1,800 acres apiece.

Now, I call attention here to the promise of the Government:

> While the Government promised to give them their homes—not directly promising to give them allotments, but saying that the President might, when in his judgment the interests of the Indians would be advanced—they might allot to these Indians in severalty, giving the Indians allotments in accordance with the sixth section of the treaty with the Omahas.

Now, gentlemen, that is the understanding upon which these treaties were entered upon, and that understanding has never been carried out.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That statement was made by the attorney seeking to prosecute the claim?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; and the only definite information, I will say, we were able to secure.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I know, but that is what I am making inquiry about. The only statement upon which the committee seemed to act was a statement made by the attorney seeking to prosecute the claims against the Government.

Now, it seems to me before we give special rights we ought to have some information concerning the matter. Why, attorneys make all sorts of wild claims, the best of them. The Lord knows what kind of claims some of them do make.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois will certainly admit that the Senate committee went into the matter at some length, and that the House committee did also.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I dare say, without knowing anything about it, that the Senate committee never had a meeting on this bill.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes. They had a hearing, and the testimony taken in the same was printed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The hearing was held by one member of the Senate committee and reported by one member.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is in error. Both the subcommittee and the full committee considered the measure and reported it favorably.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If more than two Members of the Senate ever considered the matter, I will withdraw what I have said.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Seven Members are shown in the testimony to have taken part in the hearing. This is a technical proposition, and no one claims to understand the details of it. That must be brought out in court. The committee considered that the matter was important enough to be adjusted in a court of competent jurisdiction, and that is the purpose of the bill, to refer the whole case to the Court of Claims, and let them act on the legal and equitable grounds for the claims. I suggest the word "equitable" be used, because some tribes or bands would not have a strictly legal claim, but they were in the same area as the other Indians, and certainly are entitled to their day in court along with the others.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. When were these treaties made?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In 1854, 1855, and 1859.

Mr. WALSH. And some of these gentlemen still living feel that they have been outraged by not having homes provided for them?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There are more than 2,000 involved, in tribes and separate bands, in Washington State, west of the Cascades.

Mr. WALSH. Where did they manage to eke out their existence all these many years?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. They have been having a miserable time, on the whole, because they have not had land on which to raise crops and have been forced to resort to all kinds of makeshifts to provide for their living. And they now ask for the right to take their claims before a court.

Mr. WALSH. Have they had these tracts of 7 acres during all this time, or is that what they seek?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That was an allotment to certain Indians, not to all of them. Some of them were left without anything. And, more than that, some of them had little patches where they raised potatoes and other products which they sold to the white settlers. Those were taken away from them, and the Indians were rendered homeless and without protection, even without the cultivated lands of their own on which they had made a living up to that time.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman makes out a very pitiful case, I admit.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I believe has the floor.

I remember that the testimony in the hearings before the subcommittee—the subcommittee of the House—showed that in some cases Indian allotments had been made which have been canceled, and the allotments reverted to the Forest Service, and are now in the forest domain. The Indians that had had allotments made to them have no way in which to make claims and no court of competent jurisdiction to which to apply and prosecute such claims. There are a number of those claims, particularly in the case of the Suattle Tribe, testimony concerning which was included in the hearings before the subcommittee. There are a good many cases where timber has been cut from Indian lands, and for which they have no redress against the Government, lands which they thought they had owned, but from which they were afterwards crowded off and had to give up. They had to recede before the white settlers, whether they were under the treaty or not, and, while it is some 60 years, there are some of them that are still living who can testify from knowledge concerning the treaty negotiations, and while these live they ought to have an opportunity to establish before a court of competent jurisdiction a claim, if they have one. If they have not, the Government will not be injured. But I think they ought to have that opportunity.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, there is no Indian now who remembers any circumstance that occurred in 1854.

Mr. HADLEY. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I attended a meeting at which there were many of these Indians present who discussed their cases. I introduced a companion bill to this in the House, and I am somewhat familiar with the subject. The senior Senator from my State was also present at this meeting, and at that time there were two Indians present, very old ones, concerning whom it was stated they were present at the time of the negotiation of one of the treaties mentioned in this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is the use of saying you are going to decide legal rights by the recollection of a man who was a 10-year-old boy 70 years ago? The gentleman says 60, but it is 70, or it is nearer 70 than it is 60.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman undoubtedly has had experience in the trial of cases where men testified of their recollection of matters that occurred when they were 10 or 20 years of age.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Nobody pays any attention to the recollection of what a 10-year-old boy remembers 60 or 70 years after the occurrence about a legal matter.

Mr. HADLEY. I desire to say that the Indians of whom I spoke were at least 20 years of age, or perhaps older than that, at the time of the negotiation of the treaty. They were quite old, it is true, but seemed to be quite in possession of their natural powers.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Here is the situation: White settlers got the Government to make a treaty with the Indians. And usually the Government is very fair. The white settlers grabbed the land under the treaty which the Government is supposed to pay for in some way, and then after awhile the Indians living in the same community want to have a claim against the Government, and both unite in an effort to raid the Federal Treasury. The Government has made nothing out of it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not contend that those who were unjustly treated under the treaty have not a right to present their claims?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I do not have very much faith in claims of ill treatment now that was had 60 or 70 years ago, when no one knows what constitutes them and which claims have never been presented to anybody. Usually those things result from a vivid imagination as to what took place and what people now think ought to have taken place. These claims are 60 or 70 years old and never were presented, and there is not very much to them.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows they could not have been presented. The only place to present them is to Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no. The gentleman is mistaken. We have any number of claims presented here that have been presented to the Department of the Interior, that have been argued and pushed and urged and presented to committees of Congress in the same way for many years past. Here is a claim in no way defined. It lets half a dozen tribes of Indians bring any suit they please against the United States upon what they say is an equitable claim. I think we ought to have more information. I do not know whether they ought to have the right to bring a suit or not.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman referring to the vivid imagination of the Indian or of the attorney who represents him?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I refer to the vivid imagination of anybody at 80 years of age who undertakes to tell what a legal proposition was when he was 10 years old.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] how it came about that so small a homestead as 7 acres was allotted, as seems to have been done in this case? I never heard of an allotment for homestead purposes of so small an amount of land as 7 acres to any person. I would like to know how it came about in this case.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] has the hearings in his hand and he may be able to answer that question by reference to them.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Gov. Stevens, who made the five treaties, promised to these Indians sufficient land for a home; but when the allotment was finally made there was not enough land for all the Indians at that time, but only enough land to give them 7.05 acres apiece, which, as the gentleman knows, is not sufficient ground for a farm home. That is all they were able to allot at that time. Since that time a certain tract has been set aside which would enable the Indians to have the 80 acres provided for in the Omaha treaty if we can get the adjudication in the courts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he understands that these Indians gave up 1,800 acres apiece, but there was not land to give them more than 7 acres apiece. The question is, What became of the 1,793 acres? It has not been settled upon. A large share of it is not settled on yet. Much less was settled upon when the allotment was made immediately following the treaty.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. When this allotment was made the Indians were to have 80 acres apiece. Finally, they got only 7 acres, but were again promised that they would receive what had been promised under the treaty.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The promise may have been made, but there was no promise made in the treaty. I have a good deal of confidence in the judgment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has not had quite as much experience about Indian claims as I have, and I wish he would take this bill back and reconsider the subject and find out what these claims are. If we knew what we were doing, I do not know that I would have any objection, but really I do not like legislating in the dark, as we are doing here.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that I am in agreement with him on many of these Indian claim bills, and I have objected to several of them and prevented their consideration by unanimous consent. I do think this is a little different from some of those with which the Indian Committee has dealt at different times. It appears, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] describes it, a pitiful case, and it seems to me advisable that action should be taken at this time. Of course, if the gentleman objects, the Indian Committee will endeavor to go further into this matter.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I would like to ask a question for information. I notice in the bill that you are offering—Senate bill 157—you provide that they shall bring their suits in the Court of Claims within five years from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That amendment was put in at the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. PARRISH. That bill, I notice, is reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; by the House committee.

Mr. PARRISH. I notice that the bill H. R. 10105 contains this proviso:

Provided, That suits be instituted within three years from the date of this act.

The original provision was five years. The committee amended it and made it three years. Why did the Committee on Indian Affairs make it five years in one case and three years in another?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The reason was that this bill deals with a number of bands and tribes of Indians, 71 in all, who speak different languages. They have a kind of dialect of some 80 varieties up there, and as a result it has been very difficult to get at the facts which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is anxious to have. Therefore it was thought best to have a longer period in which these claims should be filed than in a case where a certain tribe forming one homogeneous whole was concerned and where the same language was spoken by all.

Mr. PARRISH. I will say that these claims appear to be rather old, and there ought to be some arrangement by which they would be forced to submit them to the Court of Claims, the same as in the other bill.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. This bill twice passed the Senate. Protection is provided for the Government, because it provides that the court shall consider and determine any legal and equitable defenses, set-offs, and counterclaims. The gentleman from Illinois knows that that is not exactly the same language used in other bills. In some cases it is provided that gratuities be considered. It is fair, in the judgment of the Senate Committee and the House Committee on Indian Affairs, and is brought here with the idea that it is a just measure, which will give these Indians a square deal—nothing more and nothing less.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLAIMS OF CHOCTAW, CHICKASAW, CHEROKEE, CREEK, AND SEMINOLE INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10105) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate claims which the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any and all claims arising under or growing out of any treaty stipulation or agreement of the United States with the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian Nations or Tribes, or any act of Congress, or of the executive departments, affecting their property, lands, or funds, which said Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian Nations or Tribes, or any band or organized group of Cherokee Indians or enrolled individual Indian members of aforesaid Indian nations, or their heirs, may have against the United States, and which claims have not heretofore been determined or adjudicated: Provided, That said Court of Claims shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claims which the United States may have against said Indian nations or tribes, bands, groups, or individual claimants: Provided further, That the suits be instituted within five years from date of approval of this act: Provided also, That from decisions of the Court of Claims in said suits appeals may be taken as in other cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Court of Claims shall have full authority by proper orders and process to bring in and make parties to such suits any or all persons deemed by it necessary or proper to the final determination of the matters in controversy.

The claim or claims of each of said Indian nations, tribes, bands, groups, or individual Indians, as the case may be, shall be presented separately or jointly by petition in the Court of Claims, and such action shall make the petitioner party plaintiff or plaintiffs and the United States party defendant. Such petition on the part of any such nation or tribe shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed to prosecute such claim or claims under contract or contracts with the principal chief or governor of the nation or tribe interested and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and on the part of any band, group, or individual Indians by the attorney or attorneys employed by them, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

A copy of the petition shall in each case be served upon the Attorney General of the United States, and he or some attorney from the Department of Justice, to be designated by him, is hereby directed to appear and defend the interests of the United States in said cases.

Any payment heretofore made by the United States on account of any claim sued upon may be pleaded as a set-off to any such claim, but may not be pleaded as an estoppel.

Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit be instituted or petition filed in the Court of Claims within five years from the date of approval of this act, as provided herein. Upon the final determination of any suit or action instituted under this act the Court of Claims shall decree such amount or amounts as it shall find reasonable to pay the attorney or attorneys employed therein by any of the above-named Indian nations, tribes, bands, or groups, or individual Indians for their services and expenses, and in no case shall the aggregate amounts decreed by said Court of Claims be in excess of the amount or amounts stipulated in the contract of employment, or in excess of a sum equal to 15 per cent of the amount of recovery against the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask somebody interested in the measure to give me some idea of how much money is involved in this legislation if it becomes a law. I understand these tribes are not very well fixed financially. I assume that some of these claims may involve considerable sums of money.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, I will take time enough to make a very brief statement.

Mr. WALSH. I wish the gentleman would do that.

Mr. HASTINGS. When this bill was first introduced, some two years ago, it provided only that the Cherokees might bring suit. The reason for that was that the affairs of the Cherokee Tribe were completely wound up. Their rolls were completed, their lands allotted, their moneys individualized, and all paid out. They stood in the relation to the Government of a ward to his guardian after the ward becomes of age. When the ward arrives at his legal majority, in every State of the Union, so far as I know, he has a right to inspect the final report of the guardian and to file any protest against any item that the court allows the guardian, and to have that heard before the court, with the right of appeal to some other court. That was the position that the Cherokees were in. As I have stated, their affairs have been wound up. In 1898 you passed what was known as the Curtis bill. You took charge of their lands and moneys—all of their funds. You paid them out of your Treasury. What we want to do is, now that their affairs are wound up, now that the tribe is about ready to go out of existence, now that the minor is of age, we want to inspect the books of the Government of the United States. We want to examine the report of our guardian and see if there is anything we want to object to, and we want the right to go into your courts and present any objection, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

This bill did not pass last year. There came a new session of Congress. In the meantime legislation had been passed here winding up the affairs of the Creeks and the Seminoles. The gentleman may not be so familiar with it, but there is a clause in the Indian appropriation bill of last year providing for the winding up of the affairs of those tribes. The Creeks and Seminoles were added to the bill so as not to make "two bites of a cherry."

When the bill was referred to the Interior Department for a report the department thought that, inasmuch as the affairs of the Choctaws and Chickasaws were going to be wound up shortly, they ought to be added, and a new bill was introduced to cover them. That is the reason why this legislation has been introduced.

I can not tell the gentleman how much may be involved or how much these Indians may think the Government of the United States owes them or how many mistakes have been made, or whether any mistakes have been made. I am sorry that I can not be any more definite. But now that the affairs of these tribes are in course of being wound up, they feel that they ought to have the right to go into your own courts, and, in the event that they find that any errors have been made or that you owe them any money, that the matters may be settled definitely and finally, once and for all. That is shown in the letter by the department to Senator OWEN, which is embodied in this report, found on page 3. I should like to read to the gentleman just two paragraphs from it, although the letter is accessible to anybody who wants to read it in full.

> Claims of Indian tribes against the United States are constantly being brought to my attention by not only the Indians interested but by requests for reports on bills in Congress providing for submission of the claim of some particular tribe to the Court of Claims for adjudication.
> If the Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian Nations, or tribes, or any recognized band or group thereof, or any individual Indian, believe they have, under treaty stipulations or agreements of the United States with said Indian nations or tribes, or under acts of Congress relating to Indian affairs, any valid claims against the United States, it seems to me that it would be no more than just that such claims should be referred to the Court of Claims to be heard and adjudicated.
>
> It is quite evident that the Indians will not be satisfied until they have their day in court, and the constant agitation of these claims is a bar to the satisfactory administration and final settlement of Indian affairs.
> Without passing upon the merit of the various claims, I see no objection to conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine any claims which the Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indians may have against the United States under treaty stipulations or act of Congress relating to Indian affairs.

Now, with reference to this particular bill: After it was introduced and referred to the department for a report the department recommended certain amendments, and you will see that all of those amendments were adopted by the committee. Every amendment that was suggested by the Interior Department was in the nature of a protection to the Government, and every amendment was adopted by the Committee on Indian Affairs and is embodied in this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what the department means by saying that the lack of this legislation interferes with the administration of the business of the Bureau of Indian Affairs?

Mr. HASTINGS. The department unquestionably means that the representations by the Indians that the department was in error in allowing this amount or that amount, or any amount, take up more or less time of the department, and that it would be better to refer all of these matters to a court to which the Indians could go and where the Government itself would be represented by the Attorney General, with the right of appeal, so that these matters could all be settled once and for all.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman states that the affairs of several of these tribes are about being wound up. The effect of this legislation would be to keep those affairs from being wound up, would it not?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; this will be like going into court and examining the final report of a guardian.

Mr. WALSH. There could not be any final report——

Mr. HASTINGS. If the final report is O. K'd, then that ends it.

Mr. WALSH. But if it is not O. K'd, then what?

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, if the Government of the United States, through its own court, says that report ought not to be O. K'd, that the Government is in error, that it owes these Indians certain amounts, and if the court gives judgment against the Government, does not the gentleman from Massachusetts believe that in equity and good conscience the Government ought to pay those amounts to the Indians?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not believe that at all.

Mr. HASTINGS. On the other hand, if in the administration of Indian affairs the Government through its officers violated treaty provisions, paid out money it was not entitled to pay out, the Indians protesting against it, powerless to resist it, the gentleman does not believe that the Indians ought to have the right to go into your own court and have their matters decided by a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I have not said that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield I would like to ask where are these Indians located?

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from Illinois knows as well as I do that they are located in the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am under the impression that some are located in Florida and some in Mississippi.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In what respect—where is there any limitation?

Mr. HASTINGS. This confines them to the enrolled members of these tribes, and therefore they would have to be in Oklahoma. We were very careful to see that that provision was in there. I will call the gentleman's attention to the exact language if he wishes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, let us see about that. It provides:

That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any and all claims arising under or growing out of any treaty stipulation or agreement of the United States with the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian Nations or Tribes, or any act of Congress, in relation to Indian affairs, which said Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian Nations or Tribes, or any band or organized group of Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indians or enrolled individual Indian members of aforesaid Indian nations, or their heirs, may have against the United States and which claims have not heretofore been determined or adjudicated.

Now, there are a lot of Indians in Mississippi who are Choctaws or Cherokees——

Mr. HASTINGS. Choctaws.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Who have been making a bitter fight in Congress for many years to get from the Choctaws of Oklahoma a part of the land which was conveyed to the Oklahoma Choctaws. I do not see why this bill does not confer upon the Choctaws of Mississippi the right to sue the Government of the United States and set up the claim that the Government conveyed to the Choctaws of Oklahoma money or land which they contend did belong to them, and that now the Government should reimburse them, notwithstanding the Government paid out the money.

Mr. HASTINGS. I feel sure that that construction could not be placed on the language in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am sure that that construction would be placed on the language in the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am satisfied that the gentleman is mistaken. It refers to the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Creeks, or Seminole Indians, or enrolled individual Indian members of the aforesaid nations, which means a subdivision of these tribes. You have five tribes in Oklahoma. It refers to the tribes as a whole or a group or part of them.

We are willing to accept any kind of an amendment that will make that clear because no man on the Indian Committee or interested in the bill ever had the slightest thought that the language would permit Indians outside of Oklahoma to come in under this bill. We say the five tribes in Oklahoma, naming them, or a part of the tribes, and these Choctaws in Mississippi not being a part of the tribe, they could not come in. It could not include the Choctaws or Chickasaws or Cherokees outside of Oklahoma. We guarded, as we thought, in this language so that they could not bring that suit.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not think the committee ever thought about this proposition, so it takes my friend from Oklahoma by surprise.

Mr. HASTINGS. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but the gentleman is mistaken. He has not taken me by surprise; we thought about that and discussed it. As a matter of fact, I will say to the gentleman that my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] took the bill up with me, and we especially discussed it with this particular thing in view before this was reported to the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have the highest respect for the two gentlemen from Oklahoma, but after the gentleman's statement I have a little less respect for their judgment than I had before.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am very sorry for that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Because the first description in here is merely a description of the Indian tribes which made the treaty, that is all. It provides for claims arising or growing out of any treaty stipulation or agreement with the United States with the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indian tribes. There is no question but that the treaty which was made in Mississippi was a treaty which covered all the Choctaw Indians. That is only a description of the character of the treaty. Now, you bring in a bill which says "or any band or organized group of Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole Indians, or enrolled individual Indian members of the aforesaid Indian nations or their heirs," and so forth, may bring suit.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of the five tribes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It does not say anything about the five tribes. It does not say anything about Oklahoma. It does not say that this band or organization or group shall have an existing organization. Under this provision of the bill the Mississippi Choctaws, the Florida Seminoles, the Louisiana Cherokees can all bring suit against the Government and could claim that they were not enrolled, and the Government has to defend that suit, and, if it could not defend it successfully, under the treaty they would have to pay them, although they have paid somebody else the money. I think the bill ought to go over.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am perfectly willing to have the language stricken out and accept any amendment to make it absolutely clear that only organized groups or bands who are members of the tribe in Oklahoma. That was the intention of the committee, and that is the construction that we placed upon it. I contend that is the only legitimate construction that can be placed upon it, because those groups or bands must be part of the whole that is described in this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Here is a further proposition, to let any member of these tribes in Oklahoma bring suit against the Government—any member. That is opening the door pretty wide. Nobody knows what suits may be brought up. You could bring a suit against the Government because a man lost his leg, though torts are barred here, and the ordinary individual can not bring suit against the Government for any such things. This would permit these Indians to bring suits against the Government for a tort.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the construction of the language in relation to Indian affairs as to which suit may be brought would limit it to that. Of course, you could not bring a suit for individual damages such as the gentleman describes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Because it is not permitted under the terms of the bill, as the gentleman will see if he reads it closely. They must be suits growing out of matters in relation with Indian affairs.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman may be right about that.

Mr. HASTINGS. And with reference to the former objection, it is specifically understood that no Indian who is not a member of the five tribes, or any group that is not a part of the five tribes, can not bring these suits.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They have as much right to bring suit against the Government as members of these tribes have. They were just as much the wards of the Government at one time as the Oklahoma Indians were, and more so.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; but their wardship ceased 50 or 60 years ago.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, we are just appropriating money on the ground that we are still their guardians.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, that is a pure gratuity.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And it came from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is a pure gratuity.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Gratuity nothing! Why do you grant a gratuity? Because of some obligation that you assume. We now propose to build schoolhouses and drag them out of the public schools of Mississippi which they are now attending with success, where they want to go—for I have heard from a number of them on the subject—and force them to go into some public school run by the Indian Bureau, where they do not want to go. I think I shall ask to have this bill go over.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman have any objection to letting it go over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, I have never any objection to a bill remaining on the calendar.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSFER OF SURPLUS MOTOR-PROPELLED VEHICLES.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 3037, with an amendment, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend the rules and pass with an amendment the Senate bill 3037, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think we would better have a quorum here if we are going to pass bills by suspension of the rules. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Andrews, Md.	Dent	Kleczka	Reavis
Anthony	Dooling	Knutson	Riordan
Bacharach	Dyer	Kreider	Rowan
Barkley	Eagan	Langley	Rowe
Blackmon	Edmonds	Larsen	Sanders, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On this vote 313 Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] has moved to suspend the rules and pass a Senate bill with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MCKENZIE moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 3037, with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer such motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment, including spare parts, pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and no longer required for military purposes, to (a) the Department of Agriculture, for use in the improvement of highways and roads under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes': Provided, however, That no more motor-propelled vehicles, motor equipment, and other war material, equipment, and supplies, the transfer of which is authorized in this act, shall be transferred to the Department of Agriculture for the purposes named in section 7 of said act than said Department of Agriculture shall certify can be efficiently used for such purposes within a reasonable time after such transfer; (b) the Post Office Department for use in the transmission of mails; and (c) the Treasury Department, for the use of the Public Health Service under the provisions of section 3 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines.'

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the Department of Agriculture, under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes,' for use in the improvement of highways and roads, as therein provided, the following war material, equipment, and supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and not required for military purposes, to wit, road rollers, graders, and oilers; sprinkling wagons; concrete mixers; derricks; pile-driver outfits complete; air and steam drill outfits; centrifugal and diaphragm pumps with power; rock crushers; clamshell and orange-peel buckets; road scarifiers; caterpillar and drag-line excavators; plows; cranes; trailers; rubber and steam hose; asphalt plants; steam shovels; dump wagons; hoisting engines; air-compressor outfits with power; boilers; drag, Fresno, and wheel scrapers; stump pullers; wheelbarrows; screening plants; wagon leaders; blasting machines; hoisting cable; air hose; corrugated-metal culverts; explosives and exploders; engineers' transits, levels, tapes, and similar supplies and equipment; drafting machines; planimeters; fabricated bridge materials; industrial railway equipment; conveyors, gravity and power; donkey engines; corrugated-metal roofing; steel and iron pipe; wagons and similar equipment and supplies such as are used directly for road-building purposes.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is also hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the Department of Agriculture, for the use of the Forest Service, such telephone supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment which have been found to be surplus and no longer required for military purposes and are needed for the present use of the said service.

"SEC. 4. That freight charges incurred in the transfer of the property provided for in this act shall not be defrayed by the War Department, and if the War Department shall load any of said property for shipment the expense of said loading shall be reimbursed the War Department by the department to which the property is transferred by an adjustment of the appropriations of the two departments: Provided, however, That any State receiving any of said property for use in the improvement of public highways shall, as to the property it receives, pay to the Department of Agriculture the amount of 20 per cent of the estimated value of said property, as fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture or under his direction, against which sum the said State may set off all freight charges paid by it on the shipment of said property, not to exceed, however, said 20 per cent.

"SEC. 5. That the title to said vehicles and equipment shall be and remain vested in the State for use in the improvement of the public highways, and no such vehicles and equipment in serviceable condition shall be sold or the title to the same transferred to any individual, company, or corporation.

"SEC. 6. That the provisions of the act of July 16, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 454), prohibiting the expenditure of appropriations by any of the executive departments or other Government establishments for the maintenance, repair, or operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles in the absence of specific statutory authority, shall not apply to vehicles transferred, or hereafter to be transferred, by the Secretary of War to the Department of Agriculture for the use of the department under the provisions of this act, or under the provisions of section 7 of the act of February 28, 1919, referred to in section 1 hereof: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to modify, amend, or repeal the provisions of the last proviso under the item entitled 'Contingencies of the Army,' as contained in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1919, except as to direction for the transfer of those articles enumerated in section 2 hereof."

Also by amending the title to read as follows:

"An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment and road-making material to various services and departments of the Government, and for the use of the States."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands a second.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I shall only detain the House for a few moments. The first attempt to distribute the surplus automobiles in the hands of the War Department was made in the Post Office appropriation bill making appropriations for the year 1920. A little later that provision was modified by a section in the sundry civil bill and later on another modification was inserted in the military appropriation bill for the same year. These three provisions all being in the law led to great confusion. The department heads finally called upon the Judge Advocate General for an opinion. He rendered an opinion which was not very satisfactory, so they called upon the Attorney General of the United States for an opinion. He rendered an opinion, both of which opinions are found in the report upon this bill. Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill is an attempt after many months of argument to harmonize the various provisions of law and make it possible for the War Department to turn over to the Department of Agriculture the thousands of dollars worth of surplus roadmaking material now on hand and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to distribute that surplus to the various States under the provisions of the law enacted some years ago governing the building of highways in the various States.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I do.

Mr. LANHAM. I understand the present provision of law permits the use of these trucks and other road-making vehicles only on roads on which Federal aid is given. Now, under the provisions of this law when these vehicles are distributed to the States can they be used for general road-making purposes whether Federal aid is being given for the project or not?

Mr. MCKENZIE. It is understood by Members of the committee that when the machines are turned over to the States the title vests in the States, and they will have absolute control over these various machines without interference on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. LANHAM. And they can be used upon roads that even are not being contributed to by Federal aid in their construction?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I would assume so.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. As I understand it these different articles, the property of the Government, are eventually turned over to the States and become the property of the States. Now, do the States pay anything to the Federal Government at all for the property?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I was just coming to that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman will kindly explain.

Mr. MCKENZIE. If the gentleman will permit, section 4 of this bill provides that the respective States shall pay to the Secretary of Agriculture 20 per cent of the estimated value of the various articles turned over to the States as estimated under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. But the States have the right of setting off against the 20 per cent whatever freight charges they may have to pay in having these articles delivered, inasmuch as it is provided in the bill that the War Department shall not be responsible for the payment of freight.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman if he has a general statement to make in connection with the subject——

Mr. McKENZIE. No; go right ahead.

Mr. BEE. As I understand the Senate has passed this bill?

Mr. McKENZIE. The Senate has passed a certain bill.

Mr. BEE. And now the House is substituting everything after the enacting clause?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Now, would it disturb the gentleman's argument very briefly to state the difference between the Senate and the House bill, in order that Members may understand?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that perhaps the most important difference between the two bills is section 4 of the House bill, which provides for the payment of 20 per cent of the estimated value by the States to the Federal Government and which the Committee on Military Affairs of the House deemed was but just and equitable to the Federal Government and also to the respective States.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understand, the motion now is to pass the Senate bill, inserting in lieu of the provisions of the Senate bill the language of the bill H. R. 12507, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs on February 14? Is that correct?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is correct; and the purpose of that is to expedite the enactment of the law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the amendment offered is an amendment which has been reported unanimously as a separate bill by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. What is the reason for deducting the freight without pay to the Federal Government?

Mr. McKENZIE. The purpose of that is this, that the Federal Government will load it and consign it to the various points of shipment. When the freight arrives at the point of consignment the authorities in that particular State will pay the freight. If there is any surplus left after the freight is paid that will be forwarded to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SNELL. They only pay 20 per cent of the estimated value. Why should they not pay that to the Federal Government when it is loaded on the cars?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will state to the gentleman that I do not care to go into a discussion with him on that point, because I think we might agree.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this true, that the provision relative to the payment of freight is a provision that equalizes the cost? For instance, the State of South Carolina in obtaining a large amount of material within its borders would get it absolutely free unless there were a charge. The State of New York, getting that same material, would pay 20 per cent and a freight charge that would probably be more than 20 per cent. So New York in that case would be paying twice as much as the State of South Carolina.

Mr. SNELL. I will say to the gentleman we will be perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. MONDELL. But why should there not be an equitable provision here?

Mr. SNELL. An equitable provision would be for every State to pay exactly the same thing.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, when the bill was reported the State paid nothing. Now, out of this the State pays 20 per cent. It would not be fair to make a charge of 20 per cent and then say that California, shipping stuff from Camp Devens, in Massachusetts, should pay 20 per cent and then pay the freight across the continent.

Mr. SNELL. Did you ever hear of any such provision as that before as to any kind of goods?

Mr. MONDELL. This is a matter of equity, anyway.

Mr. SNELL. There is no equity at all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is it not caused by the fact that this material is mostly at the extreme eastern portion of the country on account of the war, and if it is to be a gift, and in a way it is a gift, it ought to be on even terms, and not give the State of New York the benefit of paying nothing but the 20 per cent and then California have to pay 20 per cent and the freight for transporting it to California?

Mr. McKENZIE. My colleague has the right idea.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if the committee has taken into consideration this fact, that in certain States of the United States the legislature meets only once in two years, and some of them have a budget system? The fact is that many of them do not have a surplus from which they could pay the 20 per cent. For instance, in West Virginia we are bound hand and foot by a budget system, and we have either got to wait until January of next year or else call a special session of the legislature, that will cost $60,000, so as to avail ourselves of the benefit of the provisions of this act.

Mr. McKENZIE. In reply to the gentleman from West Virginia, I will say to him that the Committee on Military Affairs gave full and thorough consideration to the very question he is now raising, and we wondered if there was any State in the Union that did not have a contingent fund from which they could take enough of money to pay such freight, how they ever build any roads in that State. If they have no road fund in the State of West Virginia, it is about time they were getting it, and I say that with all due respect. I want to say, further, that we felt perhaps there might be a State that was so handicapped, but that, even so, there would be some patriotic citizen in the State, some banker, some man who had a little money, who would come forward and give his State credit under such circumstances, and, therefore, we did not feel it was proper to make any exception to the law, for the reason stated.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Just one other question. It seems to me like taking the money out of one pocket and putting it into another.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is true.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Why should you impose the 20 per cent liability on a State when that State under its constitution and laws does not happen to have on hand any fund applicable for any such purpose?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will state to the gentleman that it may work a hardship here and there, but there would be some one who would certainly come forward, as I have stated.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman from Illinois think that all the States in the Union ought to wait because one State in the Union has not a contingent fund on hand to take advantage of this proposition? That is the proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. McKENZIE. I certainly do not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman what authority under existing law the War Department has for the disposition of this so-called surplus material? I will put it in another way. The department now has the right to sell such material as is declared to be surplus. Can it sell at less than an appraised price? Is the authority unlimited?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that he will probably remember we appointed a director of sales, a gentleman from Philadelphia, who has charge of the sale of surplus material in the War Department; and what other authority there is, except the authority in the sundry civil bill, I do not know.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now, what I am trying to get at is, how far is that authority limited? Is the Secretary authorized to sell any surplus at any price he sees fit?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know as I can answer the gentleman truthfully on that. But, judging from what has happened in the past, I will assume that he is correct in his assumption that they have the power to sell at whatever price they may determine upon.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, if that is true, is there any necessity for this legislation?

Mr. McKENZIE. I think so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It provides he may sell at 20 per cent of some appraised price; but if he has unlimited authority to sell, why could he not sell now at that price?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that it is not the amount of money by the sale of this property that we are so much interested in as in the distribution of it throughout the various States of the Union.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to ask the gentleman a question. First, let me suggest that a State can not expect to get this stuff unless it has money enough to pay the freight. If it has that, it can take care of the other. In some States the 20 per cent will not pay the freight, which it is really intended to equalize. Now, I would like to know where the bulk of this material is located and about how long after the bill becomes a law it will be available to the States.

Mr. McKENZIE. I can not tell the gentleman where the bulk of it is located, but I am inclined to think if he will go into any camp in the United States where they have put up three huts he will find road-making machinery there—machinery to build roads.

Mr. LITTLE. How soon will it be available?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Will it be available immediately? Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the only important change in this bill as now proposed from the bill reported sometime ago is a charge of 20 per cent to the States and a provision for an offset of the freight paid, not to exceed 20 per cent. The charge of 20 per cent is very important, in order to discourage States in the vicinity of this material from acquiring material that they do not greatly need because they can get it for nothing.

The offset of the freight charge is provided because that makes the distribution more equitable. To a certain extent it equalizes the cost to the States far from the localities where this material is stored with the cost to the States in the immediate vicinity of the same.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] for his kindness. I am glad this bill is up for consideration, and I sincerely hope it will secure the unanimous vote of the House.

As to the provision for 20 per cent of the value to be paid by the several States to be set off with the freight charges to which reference was made, I believe if I had the opportunity I would oppose it. But we all know when a motion is made to suspend the rules and pass a bill it is impossible to amend the bill except by unanimous consent, when considered under that procedure, and therefore we will have to accept this bill as it is presented or reject it. I trust, because of its importance, we will take advantage of the present opportunity and promptly pass it. There is no opportunity to amend it under the present circumstances, and if one State pays 20 per cent all should pay it and that will make it equitable and just. I am advised that the State highway commissions of the several States do not seriously oppose the requirement of the payment of this 20 per cent in the manner provided.

The first legislation on this subject, as you will recall, was passed when we incorporated on the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, a provision to the effect—

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all available war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purposes of the War Department, but suitable for use in the improvement of highways, and that the same be distributed among the highway departments of the several States to be used on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, such distribution to be made upon a value basis of distribution the same as provided by the Federal aid road act, approved July 11, 1916: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, at his discretion, may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of such material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction of national forest roads or other roads constructed under his direct supervision.

That was the first legislation on the subject. Following that, on the sundry civil appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, there was additional legislation, as follows:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of War is authorized to transfer any unused and surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment of any kind, the payment for same to be made as provided herein, to any branch of the Government service having appropriations available for the purchase of said vehicles and equipment: Provided, That in case of the transfers herein authorized a reasonable price not to exceed actual cost, and if the same have been used, at a reasonable price based upon length of usage, shall be determined upon, and an equivalent amount of each appropriation available for said purchase shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, and the appropriation in each case reduced accordingly: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of each official of the Government having such purchases in charge to procure the same from any such unused or surplus stock if possible: Provided further, That hereafter no transfer of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment, unless specifically authorized by law, shall be made free of charge to any branch of the Government service.

Then subsequent to that there was a provision in the Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, as follows:

Provided further, That in addition to the delivery of the property heretofore authorized to be delivered to the Public Health Service, the Department of Agriculture, and the Post Office Department of the Government, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell any surplus supplies, including motor trucks and automobiles now owned by and in the possession of the Government for the use of the War Department, to any State or municipal subdivision thereof, or to any corporation or individual, upon such terms as may be deemed best.

This is the history of this legislation to date.

There is some apparent conflict in the provisions which somewhat confused the Secretary of War. This last provision authorized him to sell any surplus supplies, including motor trucks and automobiles owned by and in the possession of the Government for the use of the War Department, to any State or municipal subdivision thereof, or to any corporation or individual, upon such terms as might be deemed best.

That gave the Secretary of War authority to sell surplus supplies, over and above those authorized to be distributed to the Department of Agriculture, the Post Office Department, and to the Public Health Service, on such terms as he might deem best.

The provision in the sundry civil bill forbids distribution not "authorized by law." It was contended that the provision in the Post Office bill remained the "authority of law" for the continuance of the distribution, and the Attorney General so held in an official opinion. There has been, however, some confusion. The Military Affairs Committee believes that the pending bill, if passed, will remove all confusion and make plain and certain the wishes of Congress in regard to the distribution of the various kinds of vehicles, trucks, articles, and materials useful in the building of good roads, and make the law simple and easy to administer and thereby secure prompt action on the part of the department in distributing them. To make certain prompt action, this bill, when it becomes law, will require the distribution of this property to these various departments where they certify it is needed. It will not only authorize, but it will direct, the Secretary of War to make the distribution without unnecessary delay. The other legislation permitted discretion to be exercised. The supplies that are to go to the Department of Agriculture are to be used for road-making purposes in the various States of this Union. There is no more important work to-day to the American people than the construction of good roads. That is being demonstrated in every progressive State. In my State at the present time there is pending before the legislature a bill, recommended by our retiring governor, Hon. T. G. Bilbo, and our present governor, Hon. Lee M. Russell, providing for the issuance of $25,000,000 of State bonds, the proceeds thereof to be used for the construction of good roads in the State of Mississippi in cooperation with the National Government. A similar bill is pending before the Alabama Legislature. The Legislature of the State of Arkansas has authorized about $100,000,000 in bonds for road building. The same thing is going on in many, yes, in very many, other States of the Union. This indicates the widespread and earnest interest of the American people in the building of good roads. Therefore, wherever we can aid, through the cooperation of the National Government, the several States in the construction of good roads, there is nothing we can do that will contribute more directly to their development, their welfare, their prosperity, and the happiness, convenience, and comfort of the people than to encourage and help this good work.

For these reasons I am glad that this bill is presented at this time, removing the discretion which was formerly vested in the Secretary of War, and requiring the distribution of this property. It was bought for war. We will make it a great benefit and blessing in peace. [Applause.] A great deal of it has been lying waste, deteriorating in value. It should have been distributed a long time ago. If the discretion had not been conferred and we had in our legislation kept our wishes clear and certain, it would have been distributed before this time. This bill takes away all discretion, makes our wishes for this distribution clear, and not only authorizes the Secretary of War but specifically and unequivocally directs him to at once distribute this property in accordance with the terms of this bill. Let the bill pass. It will do a marvelous amount of good all over the country. It will help much in stimulating and assisting road building and thereby give additional assurance to the people that the Government is in real earnest in helping them in every way possible in improving and building the highways of the Republic. We have delayed too long now. Let us pass this bill and prevent further delay. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes; with pleasure always, to my good friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. Can the gentleman give us any estimate as to the aggregate value of the property that would be available for distribution under the terms of this bill?

Mr. CANDLER. I regret that I have not the accurate figures in my possession at the present moment.

Mr. Speaker, I have, from my entrance in public life, been a consistent and persistent advocate of Government aid for good roads. I have voted for every bill passed by Congress making an appropriation for the purpose when I had the opportunity to do so. I am ready to vote for future appropriations for this good cause. Let the good work go on until splendidly improved highways traverse, if possible, every neighborhood in this great country. They will put the schoolhouses nearer the children, the towns and the farms nearer together, the churches nearer the homes, and in many other ways contribute to the comfort, prosperity, and happiness of all the people. I hope the pending bill will pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for five minutes.

Gentlemen, this bill is the one to which I called the attention of the House the other day when the House had under consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill. I think it is a bill of very great importance to road construction in this country. It is a bill that I have been trying, for my part, to get before the House for a long time. It is merely supplementary to legislation that is already on the statute books. We passed a statute requiring this material to be turned over to the public highway commissions of the States, and the Secretary of War was authorized to do so. It seems to me if he had been disposed to have done so he could have done so without any further legislation. But on the assumption that the provision of the law that we have already enacted is too general in its terms, the distribution of this property has been withheld, so it has become necessary to make it absolutely specific, in order that the War Department may know what material is necessary for road construction. The provision of the statute is to distribute this property equitably, according to quality and quantity, amongst the States according to the provisions of the good-roads act. Just as the money is distributed, so is this property to be distributed.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman state specifically how it is distributed? Can any State buy all it wants, or is there a limit?

Mr. HARRISON. There is a limit, according to the terms of the good-roads act. The good-roads law provides how the money shall be distributed amongst the States, and this simply says that the property that we hereby direct to be distributed shall be distributed in exactly the same way—equitably according to quantity and quality.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The assignment under this bill has already been made by Mr. MacDonald, head of the National Highway Commission. It is to be distributed among the various States in accordance with their needs.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. So that the distribution is absolutely equitable between all of them?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. All we want to try to do is to tell the War Department what is material necessary for road construction.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Twenty per cent of the estimated value of the property is required to be paid by the States for freight charges.

Mr. HARRISON. The object of that is this, and it seems to me it is just, to pool the freight charges. Some of this property is located in New York, for instance, and California may want some of it. Now, if California had to pay the freight across the continent, she would have to pay probably more than the property was worth, whereas if Philadelphia wanted her share of the same property she would have to pay a very limited amount in order to get it. So it was thought only just to distribute the freight charges amongst all the States, and that was reached by making the freight charge 20 per cent on the fair valuation of the property. Out of this pool the freight charges are paid, and each State pays its proportion of the freight. The property is located, as I understand it, in many sections of the United States, in various places. A considerable amount of it was property that was at the seaports ready for transportation across the sea when the armistice stopped its transportation.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand it, the Department of Agriculture under the allotment of motor trucks heretofore made has already distributed among many of the States practically their full quota of those motor trucks, while other States have not had more than 5 per cent of their quota.

Mr. HARRISON. It may be so.

Mr. BRIGGS. In those instances the States that have gotten their full quota will not be subjected to any such provision, and will not be required to pay this 20 per cent, and it can not be an equitable distribution. I should like to know about that.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] to answer that question.

Mr. REAVIS. If the gentleman will permit me, the Department of Agriculture has so far as possible made the distribution of motor trucks to those States and those highway commissions that were ready to do the work. The larger percentage of distribution that has been made to some States has been made by reason of the fact that those States were ready to go to work, while other States were not ready, and, having no storage facilities, have been waiting until their plans are completed, at which time they will receive their motor trucks.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, the old law will govern as to motor trucks. Under that the States paid the freight on the motor vehicles, and as some have been distributed under that plan all will be.

Mr. REAVIS. This is for road equipment.

Mr. BRIGGS. In the first section it provides for the distribution of motor-propelled vehicles.

Mr. REAVIS. The distribution will be absolutely equitable, because it is being made under Mr. MacDonald, Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, who has apportioned among the States the amount that each State will require, and is sending to each State its proportion when that State makes requisition for it and is ready to use it.

Mr. BRIGGS. So there will be no inequality?

Mr. REAVIS. No inequality.

Mr. HARRISON. Not only that, but I will say that as to those States that have already gotten their motor vehicles without the payment of the 20 per cent freight charge there are not any of them that have gotten their share of the other material that is described in section 2.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The effect of the whole thing is that the 20 per cent charge begins with the road equipment.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is no 20 per cent charge on any of the motor trucks that have already gone out or that are to go out?

Mr. HARRISON. That is correct.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The 20 per cent begins with the road equipment that is to go out to all the States.

Mr. DOWELL. Under what terms have the States received these motor vehicles heretofore?

Mr. HARRISON. Under the same terms as this act provides. That is, they are distributed according to the provisions of the good-roads act, just as the money that is appropriated by Congress is distributed to the States.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this 20 per cent provision?

Mr. HARRISON. No. As my friend from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] has explained, that applies to this other material.

Mr. DOWELL. And not to the motor trucks?

Mr. HARRISON. That is what we understand.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is what we understood in the committee.

Mr. DOWELL. It applies to motor trucks under this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Whatever may be the exact phraseology, the policy under which the supplemental bill was framed was that the 20 per cent charge should begin with the distribution of the new material authorized for the first time by this bill, and that the quota to be completed of former material, such as motor trucks, would be completed without regard to the 20 per cent charge. If that idea is not expressly conveyed by the language in the text of the bill, it is a matter for future consideration. That was the understanding.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman think the language in the bill, section 4, is sufficiently clear to make it plain that this bill only applies to material and not to undistributed motor trucks? Because if it does apply to undistributed trucks, the State will have to pay the freight on them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I quite concede the point, and I was only speaking of the policy as it was explained to us.

Mr. HARRISON. That can be equalized when they distribute the other material.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not think the bill contemplates that. They can not take out 20 per cent for motor trucks already delivered.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that if gentlemen will study the bill they will find that there is no inequality. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, there should be no misunderstanding nor any misgiving touching this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], my colleagues on the Military Committee, have explained the provisions of the bill fully to you. What harm could there come if a State received all this equipment which is enumerated in section 2?

Section 2 provides:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the Department of Agriculture, under the provision of section 7 of the act approved February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, and for other purposes," for use in the improvement of highways and roads, as therein provided, the following war material, equipment, and supplies pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and not required for military purposes, to wit, road rollers, graders, and oilers; sprinkling wagons; concrete mixers; derricks; pile-driver outfits complete; air and steam drill outfits; centrifugal and diaphragm pumps with power; rock crushers; clamshell and orange-peel buckets; road scarifiers; caterpillar and dragline excavators; plows; cranes; trailers; rubber and steam hose; asphalt plants; steam shovels; dump wagons; hoisting engines; air-compressor outfits with power; boilers; drag, Fresno, and wheel scrapers; stump pullers; wheelbarrows; screening plants; wagon loaders; blasting machines; hoisting cable; air hose; corrugated-metal culverts; explosives and exploders; engineers' transits, levels, tapes, and similar supplies and equipment; drafting machines; planimeters; fabricated bridge materials; industrial railway equipment; conveyors, gravity and power; donkey engines; corrugated-metal roofing; steel and iron pipe; wagons and similar equipment and supplies, such as are used directly for road-building purposes.

Now, why is that not honest, just, and fair? Your committee endeavored to be just and fair. We are very sorry that the bill has been held up so long. The Committee on Military Affairs recognized the importance of this matter and the importance of good-roads construction, which is going on in every progressive State in this Union.

Some gentlemen have complained, and justly so, of various kinds of surplus war material being left out in the weather and going to waste. Recognizing that fact, the Committee on Military Affairs has seen fit to turn all of this equipment over to the different departments, and under this bill each State gets its quota, providing it pays 20 per cent of the value for freight charges. Who can complain of that?

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] says that West Virginia can not come in under the provisions of this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] explained that we could not afford to hold up 47 States, keep them out of their material, for West Virginia to wake up and take advantage of this road fund.

Why, the gentleman from West Virginia could get half a dozen rich men in his State to put up the money and so get this material with which to construct good roads in that State. I hope he will not oppose the passage of this bill, because Mississippi, Louisiana, Illinois, California, and New York and all the other States can not afford to wait because West Virginia is not prepared for good roads. I am sorry, and I hope my good friend from West Virginia will see some of the rich men in his State and get them to put up the money. I hope he will follow my suggestion. The legislature of that State will make it good, and all they will have to do is to pay 5 per cent on the money.

What we want is for every State in the Union to have its fair share, and when we figured it out, with 20 per cent to be put up by the State that gets this construction material and machinery in order to guarantee the freight charges so that the Government of the United States would not be out anything, we thought we were doing the best thing for the taxpayers of the Nation. I know where the people of one State actually had the gall to ask the Federal Government to build sheds to cover the road material the Government gave to them. We can not go out and do everything for the States. We are willing to give them what road material and equipment the Government has if they will pay the freight charges. Who will ask us to do more? They might ask us to furnish a fireman to fire the engine and furnish the gasoline. Good gracious, men, if we give this material to the States provided they pay the freight charges, they ought to have progressive spirit enough to operate the machinery and build the good roads so that the farmer can haul his products to town and the pleasure riders may have decent roads.

This is an important matter and I hope that no man on the floor when he comes to vote will vote against it. Every man in every big city of the country and in the rural sections is deeply interested. Why should any man oppose it when the Government has all this surplus material scattered over and about throughout the United States lying idle and we put it to a good constructive use? Why should we compel them to go to the factory and buy new when the Government has all this splendid machinery and splendid material which can be put to work helping the farmers and improving country life in every section of the United States? [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the legislature of my State in a recent special session provided for the issuance of about $100,000,000 in bonds for the purpose of road building. This bill is a proper one and provides for a just distribution of governmental surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor trucks to be used by the different States in road building. The United States Government should assist the States in the important enterprise of highway construction, and this measure provides an equitable method of divesting title to this property from the Federal Government and vesting title to the same in the different States for use in the improvement and construction of public highways. The bill is rather indefinite as to the length of time each State shall have in which to signify its intention to avail itself of the right to pay the Department of Agriculture the amount of 20 per cent of the estimated value of the equipment assigned to it, but perhaps there is an implied understanding that each State shall have a "reasonable time" in which to comply with this provision. There should be no opposition to this just measure.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, the committee is highly commended for section 4 of this bill. The freight arrangement is ideal in purpose to furnish this much-needed material upon a basis of entire equality between States, while 20 per cent may not fully cover expense bill to Nevada. It is a wide step in the right direction, causing hope that Nevada's great distance and extreme freight charge will be remembered and recognized more fully in the future than in the past.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I had not seen this bill until a moment ago, because it has only recently been introduced. I think it contains a manifest injustice. I do not think the desires and wishes of the committee are reflected in the bill with reference to the distribution of motor vehicles in this particular: Some States have received practically their full quota without compensation; some States have received but a very small proportion of their quota. This bill contains a charge of 20 per cent for all material hereafter to be delivered. If such charge is made for motor vehicles, it will result in some States paying for them while other States have received them without charge. I am going to ask unanimous consent at the appropriate time to offer an amendment excepting motor vehicles from the 20 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If I understand this bill, the 20 per cent does not apply to motor vehicles.

Mr. REAVIS. Unfortunately it does. The intention was, as given to me by the committee, that it was not to apply, but on page 4, section 4, you will find in line 10 the following language:

Provided, however, That any State receiving any of said property for use in the improvement of public highways shall, after the property is received, pay to the Department of Agriculture the amount of 20 per cent of the estimated value of said property—

And so forth. That comprehends motor vehicles, of course.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I think not. I think that would refer to section 2. I do not think that would refer back to section 1.

Mr. REAVIS. There may be some doubt about that, but we either ought to do it here or it ought to be done in the Senate, and I am in favor of doing the right thing here. There is not a man listening to me who is not delighted that the time has come when it is possible to do what we are doing by this bill. This equipment was purchased originally for war purposes, to assist in the destruction of those things, both material and spiritual, that we have been toiling for centuries to produce. We have now come to a time, and we are all thankful for it, when we can make another disposition of this material, where we can utilize it in building up civilization rather than in tearing it down. We are, in a literal sense, beating swords into pruning hooks. The 20 per cent charge on this material, as provided by the bill, will, I believe, meet the approval of the highway commissions of the States. They are willing to pay it. Some of these highway commissions adjacent to the city of Washington have been making a grab game out of this material. It has come to my attention, and there is no dispute on the proposition, that some commissions close to Washington have made requisitions for motor trucks for which they had to pay nothing, have run them out of the camps under their own power and landed them at home, and have then traded them for Cadillac limousines in which to joy ride rather than to utilize for the purpose of building roads. When that was called to our attention Mr. MacDonald compelled those people to make a trade back and get their motor trucks. If the State highway commission was compelled to pay a reasonable price for this it will stop its being a grab game and will insure the Government's receiving a little money for it, and will also be an assurance that it will be utilized for the purpose of road building, and that is the purpose of this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent in my time to amend this bill by inserting in line 12, page 4, following the word "receives," the words "except motor vehicles."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to so amend the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to amend the bill in the manner in which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some information as to the effect that this bill has.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 12, after the word "receives," insert the words "except motor vehicles."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to incorporate in the original motion the amendment just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what class of vehicles does the gentleman desire to except—automobiles or trucks?

Mr. REAVIS. Motor trucks. They are not sending automobiles to these highway commissions, and in answer to the gentleman's question let me state that there are some States that have received as high as 80 per cent of their assignment and quota of motor trucks, and they have received it absolutely free of charge, except the freight. Other States have received less than 10 per cent. If you charge the States 20 per cent for their motor vehicles, you are not dealing fairly, because the same disposition was not made with reference to the 80 per cent States.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, but I think it is already accomplished in the text of the bill, and it was because the committee thought the same had been accomplished that they did not propose the amendment the gentleman asks to have incorporated.

Mr. REAVIS. In response to the gentleman, it is very likely that the gentleman is entirely correct in what he says. I have just arrived in Washington on a late train and I had not read the bill until a moment ago, and on looking over section 4 my first impression was and is that the 20 per cent applied to motor vehicles as well. If the gentleman is certain that the bill does not make that 20 per cent apply to motor vehicles, I have no desire to have this amendment considered.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is there any harm that can be done by inserting it?

Mr. REAVIS. Only that it would be useless, superfluous language, that we ought not to have, in the interest of good legislation, if there is no necessity for it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does not this very dispute indicate that there is a divergence of opinion about it?

Mr. REAVIS. I am not in a position to dispute what the gentleman from Vermont says. In any event, this bill is going to conference, and if we put this amendment in they can thrash it out in conference so that those States that have received only a proportion of motor trucks will be fully protected.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Where would that amendment be inserted?

Mr. REAVIS. On page 4, line 12. There are several prints of this bill now on the floor. The bill being considered is the bill H. R. 12507. The language of the bill is:

Provided, however, That any State receiving any of said property for use in the improvement of public highways shall, as to the property it receives, pay to the Department of Agriculture the amount of 20 per cent of the estimated value of said property, as fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture or under his direction, against which sum the said State may set off all freight charges paid by it on the shipment of said property, not to exceed, however, said 20 per cent.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why was that 20 per cent put in there at all?

Mr. REAVIS. The 20 per cent was put in there for two purposes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why not strike it out?

Mr. REAVIS. It was put in there for two purposes. One of the purposes was to stop what was evidently becoming a grab game on the part of some highway commissions that were located adjacent to the camps where the motor vehicles were and where the equipment was.

They were under no expense except for freight; they took them whether they needed them or not. Now, there would be another result accomplished: The States 600, 800, or 1,000 miles from the camp where the automobiles were, when they took the trucks, they took them without charge except the freight. The result of it was that the State close to the camp got its material for much less than the State far removed.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But the practice the gentleman speaks of was the fault of the Agricultural Department because no commissioner had the right to take these goods whether located close to the point of distribution or remote from it.

Mr. REAVIS. It is the fault of nobody, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, because the assignment was made to that State. They made a requisition for these motor vehicles on the theory that they were needed for the purpose of road building. Some of them got motor trucks—not many—and then traded them for Packards or Cadillac limousines, on the theory that their engineers had to be carted from one road-building project to another, and it turned into a sort of grab game on the part of certain commissioners, and it was only the fault of State commissioners who were prostituting the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill was very thoroughly dicussed in all of its provisions during the time allowed under the rule. The gentleman from Virginia was here, I imagine, and I am sure heard the discussion. As I understand, the question is the disposition of the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. This is all by unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that, unfortunately, I did not know, so far as I was personally concerned, that this matter was to come up and I did not hear the discussion. I just came in and was trying to ascertain from the gentleman from Nebraska the purpose of his amendment. I do not know that I am necessarily against the amendment, but I am certainly against any amendment to perpetrate something which I do not apprehend, and I am not going to agree to any such amendment so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me a minute?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have my request submitted.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If the idea is to force action on it here now I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill as amended?

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BRIGGS. To ask unanimous consent that in line 11, page 4, after the word "property," the words be inserted "described in section 2." That relates to the property and road material described.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the gentleman and his amendment, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes had it.

Mr. GARD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 142, noes 5.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the bills H. R. 9412 and H. R. 12507 on the table, both being bills relating to the same subject.

The motion was agreed to.

WATER SUPPLY FOR MISCELLANEOUS PURPOSES ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 796) in the form it is reported from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 796) for furnishing water supply for miscellaneous purposes in connection with reclamation projects.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior in connection with the operations under the reclamation law is hereby authorized to enter into contract to supply water from any project irrigation system for other purposes than irrigation, upon such conditions of delivery, use, and payment as he may deem proper: Provided, That no such contract shall be entered into except upon a showing that there is no other practicable source of water supply for the purpose: Provided further, That no water shall be furnished for the uses aforesaid unless the delivery of such water shall not be detrimental to the water service for such irrigation project, nor to the rights of any prior appropriator.

The Clerk read the committee amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "proper" insert "Provided, That the approval of such contract by the water-users' association or associations shall have first been obtained."

Page 2, line 5, after the word "said" strike out the word "unless" and insert the word "if."

Page 2, line 5, after the word "shall" strike out the word "but."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "appropriator" insert "Provided further, That the moneys derived from such contract shall be covered into the reclamation fund and be placed to the credit of the project from which such water is supplied.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk read the bill and then read the committee amendments, a very natural thing to do. I think the general practice is where a motion to suspend the rules is made to read the bill as the motion proposes to pass it. That is the only intelligent way we can understand it. I ask that the bill be read as though it was reported including the committee amendments.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill in the manner indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior in connection with the operations under the reclamation law is hereby authorized to enter into contract to supply water from any project irrigation system for other purposes than irrigation, upon such conditions of delivery, use, and payment as he may deem proper: Provided, That the approval of such contract by the water-users' association or associations shall have first been obtained: Provided, That no such contract shall be entered into except upon a showing that there is no other practicable source of water supply for the purpose: Provided further, That no water shall be furnished for the uses aforesaid if the delivery of such water shall be detrimental to the water service for such irrigation project, nor to the rights of any prior appropriator: Provided further, That the moneys derived from such contracts shall be covered into the reclamation fund and be placed to the credit of the project from which such water is supplied.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Colorado has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts has 20 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this is a very short and very plain bill. It has passed the Senate twice. As chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands I reported it out of the committee in the last Congress. This bill is in identically the same language as the one which I reported out a year ago.

We were unable to pass it in the Sixty-fifth Congress, because there were a large number of other bills ahead of it and we never reached it on the calendar. All there is to the bill is this: There are some 30 Government irrigation reclamation projects throughout the West. The reclamation law, strictly speaking, does not allow them to use water for any other than irrigation purposes. As these various reclamation projects have become settled up and developed it has become almost imperatively necessary for them to use some water occasionally for various other purposes than irrigation. For instance, on some of the projects there are sugar-beet factories, alfalfa mills, saw mills, and a great variety of enterprises that are of very great importance toward the convenience, welfare, and development of this country, and yet they are not irrigation uses, and there is no law authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant permission to take or use any water whatever for any of such very beneficial purposes. There are some of them where the railroads run across the projects and where there is no authority or way of obtaining any water to run the engines, and they have to sink wells or carry and store water in tanks for the purpose of obtaining water for the railway engines that cross the projects. And there are many other small, some of them temporary, but important uses. The bill itself is heartily recommended by the Interior Department, and it came to me, as I recollect it, from the Reclamation Service or the Interior Department originally when I was chairman of the committee in the last Congress, and, as I stated, I reported it out as such, with the same amendments and in the same language as at the present time.

Nearly all the Senators and Representatives from the Western States are interested in having this bill passed as speedily as possible in the interest of the development of their respective reclamation projects and for the relief of the conditions on various reclamation projects. The bill expressly provides no water can be delivered for any purpose to the detriment of the water service for the irrigation project and that this water shall not be used when it is needed for irrigation. It also expressly provides it shall not be used except the use of it is approved by and agreed to by the water users themselves, so they will always have the matter in their control. It further provides that whatever charges there are, whatever collections or fees or rentals there may be, from all such uses of this water shall go directly into the reclamation fund of that project.

There is a further restriction that no water can be granted for any of these various miscellaneous purposes except upon a showing that there is no other practicable source of water supply for the purpose. So it would seem as though it were safeguarded as much as possible and that there can be no reasonable objection to the people on these projects getting every beneficial use possible out of the water, especially when most of this domestic power for manufacturing use will be at times of the year when the ranchmen are not irrigating; that is, in the fall and winter, when the water, if it is not running into the reservoirs, would probably be running to waste. "The campaign," or running time, of a beet-sugar plant is in the late fall and winter, when no one is irrigating.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Do I understand that under the existing law water from an irrigation project can not be used for domestic purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is no water appropriated by or adjudicated to a project under the reclamation law expressly for domestic purposes. Of course, the settlers on a project do use water for domestic purposes, for household use, and for stock, but there is no authority or law recognizing or authorizing the use of water for manufacturing or any other of these miscellaneous uses that they want water for.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I notice in the report of the committee on this bill the statement, which I suppose was approved, where a small quantity of water is very much needed for some domestic or other use not strictly within irrigation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is the law relating to reclamation so confined that people who use water for domestic purposes use it illegally?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, it is generally conceded throughout the West that it is not an illegal use of water appropriated for irrigation purposes to drink some of it or water stock or for ordinary household purposes; that it is a very necessary and common-sense use. But in the amount of water allowed to—that is, the appropriations which are granted to—these various reclamation projects, my understanding is that there is no specific amount adjudicated to them for domestic purposes; that they have to take it out of that irrigation right.

The Secretary of the Interior in his report says:

Under the present law there is no authority for furnishing water for other than irrigation purposes for agricultural or town-site uses.

Whatever "irrigation purposes for agricultural or town-site uses" means is only what the present law allows.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Suppose a man wants to start a cheese factory on one of these irrigation projects, is there no way that he can even get water for washing out his cheese house?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No, sir. I do not think washing out a cheese house would, strictly speaking, be either an irrigation or a town-site use. We have quite a number of alfalfa mills and they can not get any water for their use.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is there not any provision for water for a city or a town?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know how far "town-site uses" would go. But if the town entered upon a municipal plant or use of water for any special commercial purposes, I think they have got to get it from some other source, the way the law is now.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, they can not get it from any other source.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In just a second. I want to ask this question: Where a town grows up on one of these reclamation projects the law is such that the town can not be permitted to obtain any portion of the water saved for irrigation for domestic use or town use—for putting out a fire in a burning house, perhaps?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think they can drink all they want or use it for household and stock purposes, and undoubtedly put out a fire with it and use it in limited quantities for domestic purposes. But under the present law the use is certainly very limited, and I do not think it is very definitely defined. I know it does not authorize the uses I am attempting to provide for in this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Not for the fire department?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not believe the present law is as extensive as the gentleman thinks it is.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. If that is correct, it is the craziest bit of legislation that was ever put over.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not positive at all as to just what things water on a project can and can not be used for, or just how much or when under all circumstances. Irrigation may and does by custom allow, as I have said, some limited use besides spreading it on the ground to grow crops. It is a question of how far the term "town-site uses" goes. I am trying to enact this law so as to prevent any questions of that kind causing trouble.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am in sympathy with the gentleman on this bill, so far as that is concerned, but not that portion of it which would permit the water users to take away the right to the use of water by a factory that had been constructed with their consent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Any use that is now recognized and in operation for irrigation or town-site uses would not be taken away from them; any beneficial uses they are now making that come rightfully under those headings would not be disturbed by this law. But no private citizens or corporations can have any vested right to water from a project under the present law, as I understand it, for a commercial or manufacturing plant, or anything of that kind.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If they permit a town to get water, in the course of time there will be towns there that will have a town water supply.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They ought to have a town water supply, but they can not use that for manufacturing purposes under the present law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think they could, but I do not know. Certainly they ought to be able to do so.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They ought to do so, but they do not. That is the reason why we ask for the passage of the bill, so that a town or anybody else can make every possible use of the water that will not be detrimental to the irrigation, and pay the project for the use of it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me a little time?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MONDELL. I would like five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly; I yield the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the inquiries of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would seem to indicate that irrigation laws are not clear and definite; but that is not true. These water rights are a matter of State grant, and not a Federal grant.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is an old contention. I do not agree with that.

Mr. MONDELL. The Federal statute books contain laws that expressly declare these water rights shall be taken and acquired in accordance with State law. The very law that we are amending, under which these rights are taken, carries that provision, and it is written elsewhere in our statutes. Under the law of irrigation there is no individual ownership of water. The water belongs to all of the people; and the State, as representing all of the people, provides the legislation under which the use and the distribution of the water are had. The Secretary of the Interior, or some one for him, goes to the proper State officer, just as any other individual would, and makes an application for a water right to irrigate a certain tract of land, the description of which he gives. If there is water available, and unclaimed and unused by others, the State officer who has jurisdiction of such matters grants to the Secretary of the Interior the right to divert the water for the purpose of the irrigation of the land which he describes, and for no other purpose, except that under the law of irrigation the use by the irrigator for domestic purposes is considered an irrigation use. The farmer, having the right to irrigate his land, has the right to use the water for all the ordinary purposes of his farm and his stock.

The Secretary, acting as the agent, as the trustee, for the future owners of the lands for the irrigation of which the water right is secured, has no authority to make any agreement relative to the use of the water except for the purposes of irrigation. He has no authority except as we give him authority as an agent to do what any other agent could do under the State law; and we provide here that, acting as the agent or the trustee of these people, he may, of the water diverted under the State law, provide for its use for certain purposes incidental to the use for irrigation, as gentlemen have suggested these uses, as, for instance, for a factory, for a railway to fill its reservoirs, and so forth.

Those contracts, when made, may be perpetual, and there is nothing in this law that reads otherwise, or for certain purposes they may be seasonal and more or less temporary.

The Secretary could not take from a factory the water which has been agreed to be delivered to it unless the agreement so provided; but if the factory ceases to do business, the right ceases and becomes reinvested in the people of the State as a whole, and only invested in another as it may be invested under State law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there, if he has time?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If I had time, I would be glad to. There must, it seems, be legislation of this kind in order to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, the trustee for the future landowners, to make this distribution of the water.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Colorado give me one minute more, if he has the time? In that case I will be glad to answer any questions the gentleman from Illinois may ask.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks what a town would do on one of these irrigation projects. It would do either one of several things. It would either secure a separate right for domestic purposes and then apply for a right to run its water through the canals of the project, or it would make arrangement for the use of a part of the water appropriated, in which case the water right should be amended or the town would condemn a part of the water of the project for the use of the town, because the right to use water for domestic purposes is a preference right, and the law of every irrigated section gives the right to condemn water, used for irrigation, for purely domestic purposes. Ordinarily the method pursued would be to ask for a right from the same source, and with it the right to carry water through the canals of irrigation enterprise.

This matter is not without its difficulties and embarrassments, and it is not without hesitation that we from the irrigated section of the country are persuaded to vote for it, though our doubts and our hesitations arise out of fears quite different from those expressed by gentlemen from sections where irrigation is not practiced. We can not through Federal enactments give the Secretary of the Interior, or anyone else, authority to utilize to any considerable extent for other purposes waters appropriated and diverted for irrigation. It is true, however, that these diversions are ordinarily made for irrigation and domestic purposes, but the domestic purposes thus contemplated are necessarily domestic purposes more or less incidental to the primary purpose of irrigation.

I realize that there is always the danger under legislation of this sort that some Secretary of the Interior, or officer acting under him, may become possessed of the notion that he has the right to sell and peddle about water for a variety of purposes, quite unrelated to the irrigation enterprise, and it is entirely possible to imagine a situation in which an officer not fully conscious of the limitations of his authority might endeavor to do things quite in conflict with the spirit of the irrigaton laws. Such action would, of course, be voidable, but in any event much harm might be done.

It is the hope of those of us from the irrigated portions of the country who vote for this legislation that the officers of the Interior Department will construe and execute this law mindful of the limitations of their authority and of Federal authority generally over the use of water within a State, and avoid the pitfalls that lie in the way should this statute be construed as purposed or intended, or understood, to in any way authorize the use or disposition of water otherwise than in strict accordance with the water laws of the States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, this bill seems to me to be perfectly clear and simple. As suggested by those that have preceded me, the water on an irrigation project is controlled by the Secretary of the Interior. The present Federal statute provides that the water upon a reclamation project shall be used for two purposes—for irrigation purposes and for townsite purposes. It makes no provision for the use of that water for any commercial purpose whatever. As these projects develop there are always more commercial uses to which the water could be put for the weeks and months in which the water runs to waste. This bill will facilitate the use of the water when it can not be used for irrigation purposes.

Now I will read you a letter received a few months ago from a State senator from my State. He writes:

MISSOULA, MONT., November 6, 1919.

Hon. JOHN M. EVANS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. EVANS: Some time ago I wrote Senator MYERS in relation to his Senate bill No. 796, relative to the leasing of water from Government irrigation projects, asking him the status of same. I am now in receipt of reply, in which he advises that same passed the Senate and has been favorably reported by the committee in the House.

I am much interested in this bill, for the following reasons: Last year we put in a saw and planing mill plant 1 1/10 miles north of Pablo, on the Flathead Branch. As water had been obtained at many points in the vicinity of the place where we located the mill, we took it for granted that we would be able to secure water there. However, after sinking between 350 and 400 feet we were never able to get enough water to anywhere near keep our boiler supplied. It has cost thousands of dollars with no result at all. The Government ditch is only a few hundred yards from us, and 1 inch of water from this would save us around $400 or $500 per month, as we have to haul practically all water used at our mill in tanks by team from other sources of supply.

I wish you would look over this bill carefully and if you see no objections in the bill I would be glad, indeed, if you would give your support and try and urge its passage as soon as possible. It would certainly be a great relief to us if we could buy from the Government a small amount of water and pipe same to our mill.

Thanking you in advance, and with kind personal regards, I remain,
Very respectfully,

W. H. SMEAD, President.

Now, there is a concrete instance where, if the Government could sell that water to a man who wanted to run a sawmill on his own project, it could save individuals considerable money. They could recoup the funds of the irrigation project to that extent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has used the word "sell." Nobody owns the water in that section of the country. I simply call attention to the use of the word because of the fact that people get an erroneous idea of what is done. This is not a sale of water, as my friend knows. It is a provision under which water can be used for a specific purpose.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. It is a sale of the use of the water. Nobody owns water in that section of the country. Under what is called a "usufruct" of the water you have the right to use it for a beneficial purpose if it is not needed for the purpose of irrigation. Nobody owns absolutely the water in our country, but he owns the right to use it under certain conditions. The Secretary of the Interior controls that water. The owner of a factory wants it for a particular purpose. The Secretary says, "No; you can not use it for an alfalfa mill, or a sugar factory, or a sawmill, or an engine." This bill is for the purpose of allowing the Secretary to let those people have water under conditions when we have a surplus of water running into the sea, and it provides that it can be done not only with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, but with the consent of the people who own the land surrounding it, and the funds accruing therefrom shall go into the funds of that particular irrigation project.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill was before the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands two years ago. The Senate passed the same bill then as it has passed this time. The House committee then placed on the bill the amendments that are on this bill at the present time. The first will be found commencing with line 8 of page 1, and the second amendment on line 7 of page 2. Without those amendments the bill would be extremely dangerous. It borders on danger now, but I believe the amendments will protect it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. It is all right, but this will give the Secretary of the Interior power to dispose of hydroelectric energy, use it on irrigation projects, which is a right that should not be given to any man without the consent of the water users who have the interest in it. It is important, but I believe it has been provided for by this amendment to the end that the water users will not consent unless they secure a fair and reasonable consideration for that use. The right in the Government in each one of these instances is identical with the private appropriator.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. KINKAID. Does not the gentleman from California consider that this protects the rights of the water users, that their rights are safeguarded by this amendment, and that there is no loophole left open whereby the privilege granted may be abused?

Mr. RAKER. I think that is so.

Mr. KINKAID. Is it not made as safe and secure as legislation can make it?

Mr. RAKER. I think it is, because it will not only protect the water users but the right to dispose of the hydroelectric energy, as well as any surplus water. The hydroelectric energy of the Roosevelt Dam was sufficient to pay the whole cost of the dam. Had that been given away, the whole value would have been given away. Not only in regard to that, but the small factory or any other enterprise which should be developed ought to pay a reasonable cost for the use of the water, and it should not be granted unless the water users are satisfied with it.

Mr. KINKAID. Does not the gentleman from California believe that the amendment sought by this bill is greatly in the interest of all the water users, and because of the community of interests existing between them and every local industry that might seek to secure water under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. There is such an interdependence and community of interests of all the users of water and industries and agents with which they deal.

Mr. RAKER. When the Secretary presents the matter whether water should be authorized to be used for hydroelectric energy or for a mill or any enterprise or any other purpose, it will be submitted to the vote of the irrigationists in that district and they will have an opportunity to canvass the entire matter and see that their interests are protected and that there is a reasonable and fair return paid for the use of the water that belongs to their enterprise.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If they used the water for the development of hydroelectric energy, it would not destroy the water?

Mr. RAKER. No; but some of these projects might develop hydroelectric power that would justify and pay the original cost. The people of that project have paid for it.

Mr. MADDEN. But they would not waste the water; they do not drink the water.

Mr. RAKER. Ordinarily not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has yielded me time, although I am not opposed to the bill. If anybody is opposed to the bill and wants the time, I am willing to yield. I would like to get a little information about the form of the bill which provides that the Secretary may make a contract with some one else, to be approved by the water users' association, and then provides that no water shall be furnished for uses aforesaid if the delivery of such water shall be detrimental to the water service for such irrigation projects. Is that a limitation, or a condition, or a direction?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think it is all three.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is it a limitation on the Secretary or a direction to the Secretary?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think it is an authority and a direction to the Secretary and also a limitation. He is authorized, upon condition that, first, he has the approval of the water users; second, that there is no other source of supply; third, that the proceeds shall go to the project, to enter into contracts to supply water for other purposes than irrigation, limited, however, by the proviso that no water shall be furnished for the uses "other than irrigation" if the delivery of such water shall be detrimental to the water service for such irrigation project.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does it limit his authority so that if he makes a contract contrary to this provision the contract is illegal, or is it a mere direction to the Secretary to be careful and not make such a contract?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the Secretary is given a certain and limited and specific authority and directed as to how and upon what conditions he can exercise it, and he can not have any more authority or discretion than the law gives him, and if he exceeds the plain limitations of the law I think his contract to that extent would be illegal.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let us get at this question. There are few, if any, reclamation projects where all the land subject to irrigation is now being irrigated. Is not that correct?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir; some of the land is very rough.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Here comes a proposition at one of these places to put up a sawmill or a cheese factory, or some other manufacturing institution which is desirable to be located there. The Secretary makes a contract and it is approved by the water users' association. Subsequently, when all the land is being irrigated, it is discovered that there is not water enough. Is this contract that has been made illegal?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My understanding of the bill and the report of the Interior Department is that whatever water is allowed to be used by this bill could not be so contracted or used as to be detrimental to the use of the water for irrigation purposes at all. Everyone would have to contract with the Secretary and also with the water users in the light of their authority under this law. Possibly the water users might be estopped from repudiating their own unauthorized contract. But there is very little likelihood of that condition arising. Contracts issued under this law will have to be subject to this law, and everyone must know that they can not interfere with necessary irrigation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How does the gentleman mean by not interfering with irrigation—that it can be used and then turned into the irrigating ditch and be used for irrigation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. The water can often be used for power or some other beneficial use and then returned to the stream or canal and used for irrigation again.

Mr. WELLING. If the gentleman will yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. WELLING. I have in mind an irrigating project where there is a sugar factory that needs 8 second-feet of water during the whole part of October, November, December, and perhaps until the 15th of January. Now, the water that is stored there under the reclamation project is not of one earthly bit of good for irrigation purposes during that particular season of the year. It does not take anything away from the water for irrigation purposes to use it for the sugar factory; but unless the Secretary has the authority lawfully to divert 8 second-feet of water for the use of this sugar factory, it can not operate in that territory.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand; and that is the reason why I am in favor of the bill. But supposing the water is used at a time when it does affect irrigation, then what is the legal effect of this provision of the bill?

Mr. WELLING. So far as the sugar factory is concerned, its use for the purposes of the factory could not interfere with the use of the water for irrigation, because the sugar factory does not begin until after the irrigation season is over. I am not able to answer the gentleman with reference to the legal effect if water is used in July or August.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will try to answer the gentleman's question. It says here—

That the Secretary of the Interior in connection with the operations under the reclamation law is hereby authorized to enter into contract to supply water from any project irrigation system for other purposes than irrigation upon such conditions of delivery, use, and payment as he may deem proper.

And then it provides that no such contract shall be entered into except upon a showing that there is no other practical source of water.

Mr. KINKAID. That is covered by the next proviso.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The proviso says:

That no water shall be furnished for the uses aforesaid if the delivery of such water shall be detrimental to the water service for such irrigation projects or to the rights of any prior appropriator.

In other words, they shall not give a man any water if the delivery of it is detrimental to the water service for such irrigation project.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But suppose they have given it to him, and then it is shown that it is detrimental, what will be the effect?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The irrigation rights would come in and take it away. They have a proviso right in the State law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman think then that if after the contract is made it is shown that there is not water enough for irrigation purposes, they can take the water away from the man who has built a factory, on the understanding that he is to have the water?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. A man can not have the understanding that he can have the water if it is needed for irrigation. Under this law he can not in good faith get any such contract, and if he did I think any water user under the project could obtain an injunction to prevent both the Secretary of the Interior and that man from using any of the water in any way that would interfere with irrigation rights, be in violation of this law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Wyoming said these were irrevocable and forever. I can not tell from the reading of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the measure, possibly because I do not understand the irrigation system of the country, but I doubt whether we should repose authority in the Secretary of the Interior, under whose jurisdiction the irrigation and reclamation projects have been placed, and then say that when he is administering the affairs of this great project he must administer them in a way that certain water users dictate. That is what we are doing in this legislation.

[At this point Mr. CLARK of Missouri entered the Hall and was greeted with applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, lest this tremendous outburst of enthusiasm should appear in the RECORD as an expression of approval of the remarks I have made, I desire to note that the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is back from Elba and that the applause is by way of a greeting to him.

Mr. BLANTON. And in recognition of the Democratic victory out there, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] needs any water to enable him to swallow that bitter pill, somebody ought to get him a glass.

Mr. WALSH. Let it also appear that the incident could not pass without the gentleman from Texas butting into the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I would like further to say that I doubt the propriety of our embarking upon a program which will permit water for reclamation purposes to be diverted under contract, stored in reservoirs for sugar factories, alfalfa mills, railroads, and other purposes. It will be done under contract, and after that has been done under contract approved by the water users, when they have a large quantity of water stored in their reservoirs if dry times come among the water users I do not believe that they can go and take that water away from the people who are entitled to it under the contract, and I believe it will result in establishing a precedent whereby these irrigation systems on these reclamation projects will be used for purposes much beyond the scope and intent of the original legislation.

They say now that some of the locomotives on the railroads passing through these projects sometimes run out of water, and they want this irrigation system so utilized that they can furnish water to the railroads. If that be the case, the railroads ought to be able to establish their own water stations and they ought not to be permitted to build reservoirs and store quantities of this water under contract between the department and themselves, with the approval of the water users, and keep it there all of the time, because a drought may occur, or something may happen to the system, and the water users will be deprived of the use of the water, because it will be in a reservoir of the railroad under a contract entered into and there would be no way of recovering it. I submit that it will be turning this system of reclamation projects and the water supply for it into commercial purposes. A lot of these promoters will go out there with beautifully illustrated literature—and while the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] smile rather audibly, I know that those promoters wander at large through the States of those gentlemen; and if they find it is easy to make contracts to get this water under this legislation, you will find that it will be used to encourage the establishment of all sorts of industrial enterprises which from the natural lack of water would never be thought of, and that the reclamation project will become a secondary consideration. That is my objection to the measure, despite the persuasive arguments of the gentlemen who know very much more about it than I do. I believe we are establishing a dangerous precedent here, and that we ought not to permit these contracts to be entered into whereby this water may be so diverted.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was interested in the gentleman's statement to the effect that he objected to the water being stored in reservoirs, particularly if a dry time should come—that there might be difficulty. I think it might be well enough to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the dry time is here and everybody is on the water wagon. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not advance that seriously as an argument in favor of this legislation?

Mr. MONDELL. Is not that quite as serious an argument as the gentleman from Massachusetts has been advancing?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, the gentleman is now entering the field of comparison, and he knows what the scholar says with respect to comparisons.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the reclamation expert from the Dakotas.

Mr. BAER. I think the gentleman's argument good in respect to the reservoir. Take a proposition where farmers get their water supply from the melting snow on the mountains. Suppose some commercial enterprise comes in and exhausts the water in the reservoirs before the spring planting comes on. The gentleman from Colorado says they would have to obtain an injunction in order to stop commercial users from using the water. The gentleman from Massachusetts is an able lawyer and he knows how long it takes to get injunction proceedings. The gentleman knows how it delays matters. They would exhaust all of the water in the reservoir, and the farmers would not have any supply for agriculture.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; or it might evaporate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I wanted to see if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to tell the House what the people of Missouri think about Republican rule in Congress?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I would be very glad to have him tell the House, but I notice that he probably anticipated the request, for he has disappeared. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have given, including the few side remarks that have been injected by gentlemen who are so enthusiastic about diverting the great Federal reclamation projects and irrigation systems to commercial interests, I am opposed to the proposed bill.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Does the gentleman feel that there need be any alarm in view of the provision that if the delivery of the water shall be detrimental to the water service——

Mr. WALSH. Oh, the water may have been delivered long before the urgent need for it arises. Hundreds of thousands of gallons of water may have been delivered to some commercial enterprise, and later something may happen to the system. Then they can not get the water back.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. The gentleman realizes that it comes under the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; if the water users approve it. The very men who are interested in this project may be the water users, and they will be the ones to bring the pressure to bear upon the Secretary to enter into this contract. I hope the bill will not pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado to suspend the rules and pass the amended bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes were 62, the noes 9.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think on such an important question as this—Mr. Speaker, I do not dare to make the point.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 406, to which unanimous consent was not given this morning for consideration, be placed at the bottom of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to be permitted to remain at the bottom of the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the timid gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] I would like to make the point of order of no quorum right now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order of no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, February 17, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Chief of Bureau of Efficiency, transmitting report on the Federal Government's activities in the promotion of foreign commerce (H. Doc. No. 650), was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, submitted a report (No. 637) on expenditures in the War Department—aviation, which said report was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed with illustration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BEE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12333) for the relief of Albert T. Huso, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 636), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12425) for the relief of Orlando Ducker, major and surgeon in the War with Spain, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 12556) limiting the number of pages of newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals entitled to transmission in the mails as second-class matter; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12557) to prohibit the export of wood pulp and print paper for the period of one year; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MICHENER: A bill (H. R. 12558) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the village of Manchester, Washtenaw County, Mich., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BRITTEN: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 295) calling attention to a violation of the Monroe doctrine; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the Senate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, urging the President of the United States to defer the proposed sale of the ships of the German merchant fleet taken by the United States during the late war; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, regarding the Armenian situation; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DOMINICK: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, regarding the Armenian situation; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ROGERS: Memorial of the Senate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, urging the President of the United States to defer the proposed sale of the ships of the German merchant fleet taken by the United States during the late war; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. TAGUE: Memorial of the Senate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, urging the President of the United States to defer the proposed sale of the ships of the German merchant fleet taken by the United States during the late war; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BEGG: A bill (H. R. 12559) granting an increase of pension to Eugene B. Dwight; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 12560) granting a pension to Willie Lee; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CANTRILL: A bill (H. R. 12561) granting a pension to Margaret Smallwood; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12562) granting a pension to James Baker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CASEY: A bill (H. R. 12563) to place the name of Jedediah C. Paine upon the unlimited retired list of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 12564) granting an increase of pension to James W. Titus; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FERRIS: A bill (H. R. 12565) granting an increase of pension to William J. Givens; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KEARNS: A bill (H. R. 12566) granting an increase of pension to James E. Wilson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KELLEY of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 12567) granting a pension to Charlotte F. Perrin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KENDALL: A bill (H. R. 12568) granting a pension to Lennie Ann Shunk; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LANGLEY: A bill (H. R. 12569) granting an increase of pension to Clara A. Collins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12570) granting a pension to Robert Gardner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 12571) granting an increase of pension to William J. Degnan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 12572) granting a pension to Mary Long; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 12573) granting a pension to Rufus Dewitt; to the Committee on Pensions.

1604. Also, petition of sundry citizens of Melville, Mass., favoring the enactment of the Sims bill (H. R. 262); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 17, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou dost rule all things through the changeless order of Thine own will and providence. Thou hast given to us the changeless principles upon which we are to build our lives. We lift our hearts to Thee that we may be put in accord with the divine will. We come to the source of truth. If any of us scorn the truth, we pray Thee to give us special illumination. If any of us doubt the ultimate triumph of the truth, give us the inspiration that Thy grace alone can supply. Help us to consecrate ourselves to the truth, that Thou hast revealed to us through Thy Son. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS (S. DOC. NO. 224).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending that the proposed appropriation of $500,000 in the pending second deficiency appropriation bill for "relief of contractors" be increased to $1,000,000, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES HOUSING CORPORATION (S. DOC. NO. 225).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Labor submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $300,000 required by the United States Housing Corporation for operation of projects, fiscal year 1920, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 796) for furnishing water supply for miscellaneous purposes in connection with reclamation projects, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2454) for the relief of certain members of the Flathead Nation of Indians, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 194) amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Hale	McCumber	Smith, Ga.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] is detained by illness. I ask that this notice may continue for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. EDGE], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] on business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] are detained at a meeting of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained at home by illness.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are detained by illness in their families. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is detained by the illness of a member of his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KEYES presented a memorial of Carders' Local Union No. 1147, United Textile Workers of America, of Manchester, N. H., remonstrating against the spreading of propaganda proposing to overturn the present form of government in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Luka Post No. 304, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Oak Hill, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of McPherson County, Marion County, and Kiowa County, and of Spring Creek Union Grange No. 1682, Patrons of Husbandry, of Sedan, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of the Pattern Makers' Association, of Detroit, Mich., and a memorial of Cigarmakers' Local Union No. 22, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Sterling sedition bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for the speedy ratification of the League of Nations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Post No. 13, American Legion, of Pasadena, Calif., praying for the enactment of legislation giving rank to Army nurses, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 12046) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 426) thereon. I wish to say that I shall undertake to call up the bill for consideration to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3928) relating to the ships acquired from Germany, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. NUGENT:

A bill (S. 3929) permitting all members of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Army, Regular Army Reserve, Naval Reserve Force, and the United States Marine Reserve Corps to purchase supplies from the commissary stores of the Army and Navy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 3930) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Fulton, Callaway County, Mo., a captured German supergun; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARTICLE BY DR. CHARLES W. ELIOT.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Times of Sunday last, by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, of Cambridge, Mass., on the subject of Senate obstructionists' estimate of the people.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 15, 1920.]

SENATE OBSTRUCTIONISTS' ESTIMATE OF THE PEOPLE—DR. ELIOT CALLS IT THE LOWEST EVER MADE BY NATIVE OR FOREIGNER, AND SAYS SENSELESS APPREHENSIONS HUMILIATE AMERICA.

[By Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University.]

The Senate obstructionists to ratification apparently hold the opinion that the American people are too dull to see that their interest in the travail of the world is now just what it was in April, 1917, when they went to war eagerly and unanimously on behalf of arbitration of international quarrels—a characteristic American doctrine for a century past—reduction of armaments, security for small nations, safety for all democracies, and strong international means of preventing war by physical force as well as public opinion. Three years ago the American people could draw the logical conclusion from the sinking of the Lusitania, the presence of German submarines off Nantucket, and the proposal of Herr Zimmermann that Japan and Mexico should unite to attack Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona. They then saw the menace of the German power to our freedom. They saw that Great Britain and France were staggering under the German assaults, and hurried to the rescue. But now the Senate obstructionists seem to think that they can lead the people of this country to believe that the objects for which America fought are attained, that the old despotisms are crushed, and the new ones will destroy themselves; that America has no interest in helping Europe or Asia to peace and order, and may safely withdraw to isolation and the care of her own material interests on her own territory. America first! This is the lowest estimate of the intelligence and good sense of the American people that has ever been made by native or foreigner. That such an estimate should be made by public men who had the means of watching the way the minds and hearts of the common and uncommon people in the United States worked in 1917 and 1918 would seem incredible, but is a humiliating fact.

The obstructionists also believe that the American people relapsed into gross selfishness when the fighting stopped, and are now ready to do the best they can for themselves, without concern for either the miseries and terrors or the trembling hopes of Europe and of humanity. The obstructionists actually urge the people to abandon the altruistic motives which have governed them for three years past, and to be henceforth selfish and hard-hearted. Safety first! Save yourselves! Never mind these others who have fallen among thieves and are left half dead. Never was a sympathetic and generous people more misunderstood and misinterpreted by a group of their own elected servants.

The obstructing Senators express great anxiety lest the assembly or the council of the league should in some way impair the rights of the American Congress or interfere with our domestic affairs. Such fears indicate that those who feel them either do not understand the meaning of the few short articles of the covenant of the League of Nations or have failed to attain to an adequate conception of the influence America has had in the preparation of the treaty and covenant or will have in carrying them into gradual execution, an influence solidly based on the immense resources of the country and the enterprising spirit of the people in both peace and war. What little Americans they are who harbor such baseless and fantastic fears! Did any power interfere with the United States before she proved herself the strong power she is now everywhere known to be? What power in Europe, Asia, or Africa will think it expedient to assail or try to circumvent the constitutional rights of the legislative branch of the most powerful and resourceful State in the whole league? One would suppose that these timorous Senators were thinking of what might happen to some weak or backward State at the hands of the big international association.

Some of the obstructing Senators are much concerned because the United States is to have only one vote in the international assembly, like France and Italy; whereas the British Empire is to have one vote, and Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India will also have one vote each, making six votes in all for the actual governments of British derivation. But what have we to fear from that equitable arrangement? Did not those peoples help to win the war? Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand are intense democracies which are much more likely to agree and act with us than with France or Italy, or even Great Britain, in the international discussions of the future. Moreover, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council require unanimous consent, so that each single member has an absolute veto on any proposed action in either body. (Art. 5.) What a blind jealousy or faint-hearted apprehension must lie behind this objection to ratification!

The obstructing Senators have exhibited an extraordinary timidity about the means of withdrawing from the League of Nations. The covenant of the league contemplates a permanent league which is to carry out through a long series of years the new international policies which are admirably described in the preamble to the covenant, as follows:

> The high contracting parties, in order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war; by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations; by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among Governments; and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another agree to this covenant of the League of Nations.

Nevertheless, these high contracting parties, in order not to bind themselves to perpetual membership in the new League of Nations, provided in the last sentence of article 1, a natural, peaceful means of withdrawal from the league, as follows:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

This is just such an amicable arrangement as reasonable partners in a business firm might make to provide for the withdrawal of any member of the firm who for any reason might wish to withdraw. At the proviso in this sentence the obstructing Senators took intense alarm and have insisted that no power but the United States should have any right to decide whether the obligations of the United States under the covenant shall have been fulfilled. The obligations of the United States which most excited their alarm resulted from article 10, which declares as follows:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

The council is to "advise" only, not give orders. The obligation of members of the league to "respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing independence of all members of the league" is, of course, essential to the effective promotion of "international cooperation" and to the achievement "of international peace and security." An essential part of the treaty relates to the new boundaries of European nations, old and new, and it is obvious that the fruits of the military victory won by the allied and associated powers will not be reaped unless these boundaries are substantially preserved. The objects for which America made her sacrifices of men and treasure will not be attained unless Alsace-Lorraine goes back to France, Poland is reconstructed, and Italia irredenta is restored to the Kingdom of Italy. Still, the freedom of action of the United States is not threatened; the council can only advise the cooperating nations what to do.

The obstructing Senators are appalled at the possible cost to America of this obligation to maintain these new boundaries, a cost, they think, which might be determined by the council and not by the Government of the United States. They declare that neither the assembly nor the council should be allowed to say whether or not the United States had fulfilled all its obligations when it wishes to withdraw from the league, or to determine the contribution the United States should make to the preservation of the new national boundaries which the treaty creates. They apparently can not see that the covenant and treaty do not abridge the future freedom of action of the people of the United States, or of any other people represented in the league. Suppose the council of the league entertains the opinion that the United States has not fulfilled all its obligations at the moment when it would like to withdraw from the league, what can the council do to prevent the withdrawal of the United States? No decision of the council can be made which the United States does not like, for the council can take no action whatever without the consent of the United States, since unanimity is required for council action. The United States has an absolute veto on every decision of the council. Suppose the council to entertain the opinion that in order to preserve the boundaries fixed by the treaty the United States ought to send over a million men to fight in Europe. If the Government or Congress of the United States does not assent to that measure the council can not enforce its own view. The obstructing Senators are not fighting any real danger to American institutions or American freedom. They are shuddering at spooks and bogies of their own summoning.

But perhaps one might conceive that this League of Nations, through its assembly, council, or international court, might nefariously contrive some amendment of the covenant or treaty to which they might hold that the United States was bound. Even this apprehension is absolutely excluded by article 26 of the covenant, which describes the careful mode in which amendments to the covenant may be effected. The last sentence of the article is as follows:

> No such amendment shall bind any member of the league which signifies its dissent therefrom; but in that case it shall cease to be a member of the league.

Three reservations out of 14 are apparently intended to protect citizens of the United States from interference by the league with their personal business relations, property rights, and valued privileges of associations. Such interferences could only proceed from the council of the league or from commissions created or superintended by that council. But how could they possibly proceed from the council directly or indirectly? There sits at every meeting the representative of the United States of America, holding an absolute veto on every decision of the council. It is incredible that the American representative should allow to pass any measure which could possibly affect the property rights or legitimate privileges of citizens of the United States. Again, a senseless apprehension and futile precautions against imaginary dangers are exhibted without shame by American Senators! What a humiliation for the country before the wondering world!

The American people by a great majority wish to "carry on" heartily and strongly until the ends for which they went to war are measurably attained. They do not propose to count the money or the work which "carrying on" will cost. If they were disposed to do so, they would have to take account of the opinion held by competent economists, engineers, and sanitarians that the cost to America of "quitting" now would be vastly greater than the cost of "carrying on." They do not propose to abandon the cause for which thousands of American youth died on French soil in 1918. They mean to try resolutely and patiently to abolish militarism, prevent war, promote liberty under law, and so make the world a happier place to live in. They cry aloud to all obstructionists: We wish to get into the League of Nations and stay in. It is the best hope of the desolated and distracted world. We wish to help put into operation at once the ameliorating and restoring provisions of the league and treaty combined. Let us have no more heartless delays or meaningless discussions. Ratify the covenant and treaty, and let us Americans get to work at utilizing and multiplying the manifold good in them.

CHARLES W. ELIOT.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., February 12, 1920.

PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, I offer a letter which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTINENTAL AND COMMERCIAL
NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO,
Chicago, February 7, 1920.

Hon. MEDILL MCCORMICK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: It has been brought to my attention that the Committee on Agriculture of the United States Senate has favorably reported the Gronna bill, which, if passed, will do away with the Government guaranty affecting the price of wheat to June 1 this year. It seems to me that the Government is under a very strict moral obligation to abide by the guaranty which it made, covering the marketing until June of this year of the wheat crop grown in 1919. The farmer was encouraged greatly to increase his acreage by reason of the law fixing a minimum price, and it would be decidedly unjust to the farmer to repeal this statute and have the repealing act become effective as proposed.

Not only did Congress and the administration agree to protect the grower in the marketing of his wheat, but, through the inadequacy of transportation, it has been impossible to market the wheat produced last year, as we are reliably informed by our constituents that at least 200,000,000 bushels have failed to reach the markets because of lack of transportation facilities. The inability of the railroads to handle the grain offered has been due to several reasons, the principal ones being shortage of proper rolling stock, congestion at terminals, and the general disorganization growing out of the coal strike. Certainly the holders ought not to be denied the minimum guaranty on wheat held back for this reason.

Contracts have been entered into between elevator owners and millers which would in effect be abrogated by the passage of the bill now under consideration. If it should become law it would entail heavy loss by these interests, but still heavier and more widespread loss upon the agricultural community. The farmer would have every right to regard this as a breach of trust.

I very much hope that you will give this your earnest consideration, because I believe that the enactment of the Gronna bill would be very unfortunate.

Yours, very truly, RALPH VAN VECHTEN,
Vice President.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in the course of some remarks yesterday by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] reference was made to the disposition of certain German ships which for a time were sailed under the American flag, including the Imperator and other vessels of like character. Without saying so, perhaps the Senator left the impression that these ships had become the property of the United States, and that they had been given away, as the Senator expressed it, by the Shipping Board. I think a plain statement of the facts in reference to the matter will be helpful, and I desire to put into the RECORD at this time a letter addressed to me by Raymond B. Stevens, of the Shipping Board. We never did have any title to those ships. They never belonged to us in any sense whatever. They came to us under the terms of the armistice, which provided as follows:

In order to secure the provisioning of Germany and of the rest of Europe the German Government shall take all necessary steps to place the German fleet for the duration of the armistice under the control and the flags of the allied powers and the United States, who shall be assisted by a German delegate. This arrangement shall in no wise affect the final disposal of such vessels. The Allies and the United States shall, if they consider this necessary, replace the crews either entirely or in part, and the officers and crews so replaced shall be repatriated to Germany.

These, Mr. President, were not the ships which were seized by the United States in its ports or elsewhere. They were ships which were voluntarily turned over by the German Government, ships lying in her ports after the war was over, pursuant to the terms of the armistice, to be divided among the Allies as should be determined. The allocation of these ships was made by what was known as the allied maritime council, our representative upon that council in London being Mr. Raymond B. Stevens, a member of the Shipping Board, heretofore referred to. When these ships were thus turned over to the Allies the United States asked for a number of them to be used as transports to aid in the transportation of our soldiers abroad to their homes in this country. Pursuant to this request the Imperator and the other ships referred to by the Senator from Arizona were by the allied maritime council turned over to the United States for temporary use as transport ships. When they were no longer required for that purpose the ships, under the direction of the allied maritime council, were turned over to Great Britain for use until final disposition of them should be made by the treaty or the representatives of the allied powers.

The suggestion is made that they ought to be distributed, and probably they will be distributed, in the proportion in which the various allied countries lost ships by submarine warfare, credit being given to Germany on the reparation account. Of course, in any distribution upon such a basis Great Britain will receive a very high percentage and the United States a comparatively low percentage, the losses of American tonnage being relatively small.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand it, the ships that are particularly involved in this controversy, and which it is proposed to sell, are the interned ships in our ports.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly; the Senator is quite correct about that; but the Senator from Arizona, in making his argument yesterday in support of his resolution, stated that not only were those ships about to be sold at an inadequate price but that the Shipping Board had actually given away gratis a number of other ships, including the Imperator.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD the following letter from Mr. Stevens concerning this subject.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, February 16, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: One of the conditions of the extension of the armistice was that all German ships in German ports, both cargo ships and passenger ships, should be turned over to the Allies for their use pending the final disposition of the ships by the peace conference. It was further agreed among the Allies that pending such disposition the control of these ships should be in the hands of the allied maritime transport council or in the transport executive, which afterwards took the place of the transport council. The transport executive was authorized to distribute these ships among the different Governments for immediate use. It was distinctly understood that this did not carry with it any title to the ships or any right to retain them permanently. The nation receiving the ships, or any part of them, was to fly on the ships not only the flag of that nation but the flag of the allied maritime transport council. Under this plan the transport executive assigned certain passenger ships to the United States Government for the purpose of transporting American troops. When this service was completed by the United States Government, these ships were turned over, at the direction of the transport executive, to Great Britain for use by that Government until their title was finally disposed of by the peace conference.

I understand the agreement arrived at for the final disposition of all these enemy ships, including the passenger ships in question, was that they should be put into a common pool and distributed among the European Allies in proportion to their submarine losses. Under this rule undoubtedly the greater proportion of these ships will eventually go to England, as England suffered by far the greatest losses through the submarine warfare. The United States does not share in that distribution, because we have retained, with the permission of the Allies, all the enemy ships seized in our ports at the time we entered the war. It can not be said that the United States has been treated unfairly in the distribution of the German ships, since the ships retained by us are greater than our total losses, whereas the share of the German tonnage received by other nations is substantially less than their losses.

The Shipping Board in surrendering these German passenger ships which had been used for the transportation of troops gave up no rights of the United States. It merely carried out an express agreement which had been entered into by all the Allies, including ourselves, previous to the assignment of these ships to us for our use.

Very sincerely, yours, R. B. STEVENS,
Vice Chairman.

DEMOTION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the interview given by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on the policy of the General Staff in relation to the demotion of Army officers.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, Jan. 25, 1920.]

INJUSTICE HAS DEMORALIZED THE ARMY, SAYS CHAMBERLAIN—CONDUCT OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT DECLARED TO BE CHARACTERIZED BY UNFAIRNESS—NOT MERELY POOR PAY IS THE CAUSE OF THE PRESENT DISSATISFACTION.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

That the morale of the Army can not long stand up under the injustices being committed in the matter of demotions and promotions is the belief of Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate. Senator CHAMBERLAIN has been one of the frankest critics of conditions in the Army, and it was for that reason the Tribune asked him for an answer to the question:

"What is the matter with the Army?"

One of the explanations most frequently heard is that the pay is too small. That is not the true one; or, rather, not the fundamental one, according to Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Asked just what the trouble was as he saw it, the Oregon Senator made the following statement:

"What is the matter with the Army? Why are so many officers resigning? Why are there such bitter complaints about the Army by the Army officers themselves? Many answers have been made, but the most frequent one is that the pay is too low. But is that the prime reason? I don't think so.

"The old Army of the eighties and nineties was poorly paid, poorly fed, poorly housed, and existed under other conditions that would seem barbarism to the present Army of to-day. And yet that old Army had a high morale, was proud of itself, and, when called upon to go into a war unprepared as to numbers and equipment, won the unstinted praise of every observer, foreign and domestic, by its superb bearing on the fever-haunted soil of Cuba, as well as on the western plains.

"The basis of morale in the Army, as everywhere else, is honesty and fair dealing by those in power. How, then, can we expect the Army to have any morale at all when it is the victim of unfairness so flagrant as to seem impossible except among savages?

THOUSANDS DEMOTED.

"Nearly one year ago the War Department began to demote Regular Army officers from their temporary rank and thus return them to their proper grades in the Regular Army. They began with major generals and brigadier generals, so that soon a number of Regular officers who had won distinction in France found themselves majors and lieutenant colonels, and even captains in a few instances, while hundreds—yes, literally thousands—of their juniors continued in the grades of lieutenant colonel and colonel. Complaint elicited only the reply that some injustices must inevitably result during the demobilization of 3,500,000 men, but that all would be corrected before demobilization was complete. These officers were drawing $50 to $100 a month less pay than their juniors—some junior by as much as 19 years—and yet not a great deal of complaint was made, because they thought the War Department sincere in saying the condition would soon be corrected.

"But was it corrected? To the everlasting shame of the War Department it must be said that not only has the condition been unchanged but the unfairness of the demotions has been emphasized by still more unfair promotions.

"To-day there are hundreds of Regular majors and lieutenant colonels who served with the greatest distinction on every field in France who daily serve with juniors who outrank them by one or two grades and who draw from $50 to $100 more pay a month for doing work of far less importance and responsibility. And these older men are the ones who have grown families to support and those other extra expenses that come with advancing years and a growing acquaintance. Honesty and fair dealing! To these men those words are only a mockery.

"The Chief of Staff in February, 1919, refused to promote these demoted officers so as to put them in their relative places in the Army, saying it was not the policy to make any promotions. But what then? A little later the road was cleared for promotions 'where the officers were on work commensurate with the increased rank.' Did the demoted brigadier generals profit by this? I have heard of only two instances, both in the office of the Chief of Staff—Lieut. Col. John W. Barker, who was promoted to full colonel until he was relieved from the office of the Chief of Staff and ordered to the General Staff College, when he was again demoted to lieutenant colonel; also, the still worse case of the Chief of the Personnel, in the office division of the Chief of Staff, who was demoted to the grade of major from that of brigadier general October 31, 1919, and promoted back to the grade of colonel the next day, November 1, 1919.

"Lest you think this picture overdrawn, here are a few of those demoted from the grade of brigadier general, together with their present rank, while there are hundreds, and in some cases probably more than a thousand officers, both regular and emergency, from civil life, who still outrank the officers named.

"Lieut. Col. C. W. Kutz, at present Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, was graduated from West Point in 1893 near the head of his class. He served with great credit and even distinction until the outbreak of the World War. He was sent to France in July, 1917, and did such excellent work with a regiment of American railroad engineers back of Verdun that the French decorated him and the United States made him a brigadier general. On February 5, 1918, he was demoted to lieutenant colonel, which grade he still holds.

A CONTRAST.

"Contrast his case with that of Col. James G. Steese, also of the Corps of Engineers, but who was graduated from West Point in 1907, 14 years after Lieut. Col. Kutz. Col. Steese served only in the United States in the personnel division, first of the Engineer Department, but later in the office of the Chief of Staff. Col. Steese was given a distinguished service medal and is still a full colonel. Then there is Col. John M. Wright, also of the Corps of Engineers, who did not serve outside the United States during the war, but who remained a full colonel until he resigned January 1, 1919.

"Maj. Leroy T. Eltinge, who served throughout the war on Gen. Pershing's staff, first on operations and then as bridagier general and assistant chief of staff of the American Expeditionary Forces, with all the responsibilities of that office, is now assistant commandant of the Army Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., with the rank and pay of a major. Justice and fairness?

"Maj. Hugh A. Drum, who served throughout the war, first on Gen. Pershing's staff and then as chief of staff of the First Army all through the terrible days of the Argonne, now commandant of the Army Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, with the rank of major.

"Maj. Malin Craig, brigadier general and chief of staff of the First Army Corps and later of the Third Army throughout the war and later occupation of Germany, now major at the General Staff College at Washington.

NOW AN INSTRUCTOR.

"Lieut. Col. Paul B. Malone, Infantry, served with great distinction in France, first in the training section of the General Staff and later, first as colonel and then as brigadier general, in the line through nearly all the heavy fighting of the war. Now a lieutenant colonel and assistant commandant of the Infantry school at Camp Benning, Ga., where at least one officer is serving as instructor with the full rank of colonel, but who graduated from West Point 16 years after Col. Malone.

"Or, as a last example, Maj. Harold B. Fiske, West Point graduate, 1897, went to France as one of the very first. Served with great distinction first as assistant and later as chief of the training division of Gen. Pershing's staff with the rank of brigadier general. Now a major of Infantry somewhere in the South.

"These examples could be multiplied by the hundreds. And yet in Washington on the General Staff nearly all the officers still retain emergency rank of one to three grades above their actual rank.

"That the Army is not utterly disorganized speaks volumes for its inherent honesty and loyalty, but no organization under the sun can stand such glaring evidences of favoritism and unfairness for an indefinite period.

"And yet the Chief of Staff and the Chief of General Staff, who are responsible for these injustices, go before Congress and urge promotion by selection, saying that while in the past favoritism might have been practiced, it could not occur under present and future conditions. 'Oh, duty, honor, country'—the motto of West Point, and indeed the whole Army—what shameful days! What black ogres loom up in the future, when the uneducated and untrained in love of country shall realize the depths of infamy to which some have sunk, who for long years were trained in thy meaning!

"The Secretary of War has called into conference some of the higher officers of the Army to attempt to equalize this situation. They should be able to work out the problem, and every friend of the Army hopes they will be able to do so."

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. H. H. Gross, of Chicago, to farmers of Oklahoma, and an answer to that letter from the president of the State Farmers' Union, Hon. John Simpson.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and answer are as follows:

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING LEAGUE,
Chicago, January 19, 1920.

Mr. D. K. HIEBERT,
Weatherford, Okla.

DEAR SIR: I thank you very much for your letter of the 15th. I think I will have it framed and hang it in my office as a literary production. If there were not so many misspelled words in it, and so many meaningless sentences, one might have some respect for your opinion.

I question very much whether you have a copy of the bill, or, if you have, whether your judgment would be good regarding it. The American Legion, representing 4,000,000 boys, at their convention in Minneapolis, indorsed universal training. State after State convention did the same thing. I sent out circular letters to hundreds of boys in different parts of the country, and 95 per cent were favorable to the proposition. You do not know what you are talking about!

I know this: There is a definite and vicious propaganda being carried forward, with Russian and probably German money, to break down the morale of the American people, lull them into a sense of false security by the statement that there are to be no more wars and that we may as well chance the future as we did the past; and an effort is being made to get in their work in the various industries.

By the way, I was told a few days ago that quite a number of men in your neck of the woods came pretty nearly going to jail for attempting to interfere with the selective draft. Do you know who they are?

As to the merits of the question, the administration favors universal military and vocational training. Gen. Pershing does so, and every military man in the country. The Members of Congress who have been on the committees and spent months in investigating the subject all know it is the thing to do. Some of them are afraid of their constituents and so hesitate.

Do you not think you are assuming a great deal to pass arbitrarily upon one of the great questions of the world, that is being urged by men who are 100 per cent loyal—men of experience, men who know enough to realize that the safety of this Nation requires that it should be in a position to defend itself, and if it is in that position no other nation will trouble it?

I hope you know more about farming than you know about legislation. As far as I am concerned, this ends our correspondence; say what you like or do what you please.

Yours, truly,

H. H. GROSS, President.

FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
OKLAHOMA DIVISION,
February 9, 1920.

Mr. HOWARD H. GROSS,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of January 19 to Mr. D. K. Hiebert, of Corn, Okla., is a splendid illustration of the arrogance and insolence of militarism. I know this old farmer. He and his wife and children in the heat and dirt of the long summer days produced wheat each year of the terrible war sufficient to feed 500 soldier boys every day of that time.

Now, during that awful two years you never produced a loaf of bread. All you did to win the war was hot-air service, four-minute speeches in 10-cent theaters. So far as whipping the Kaiser, it would have been easier to do if you had been dead, for what you ate would have fed a soldier.

Mr. Gross, there are so many old farmers in this country who spell like D. K. Hiebert that it spells defeat for the "compulsory military training" program you and your associates are trying to saddle on the taxpayers of this Nation.

Mr. Gross, the farmers are on the job, ready to meet you and your league in any kind of a contest from a spelling match up.

Yours, truly,

JOHN SIMPSON.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, yesterday I gave notice of a proposed amendment to the rules, which went over. Pursuant to that notice I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator have it read?

Mr. NORRIS. Let it be read.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall be glad to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 308) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXII, Standing Rules of the Senate, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

"All debate when any matter is, under the rules, properly before the Senate shall be confined to such matter, and the question as to whether such debate is pertinent or not shall, when the point of order is made, be decided by the Presiding Officer without debate; and if his decision is not overruled on appeal, and is that the Senator having the floor is not speaking in order, such Senator shall take his seat and shall not speak again except upon the subject before the Senate."

Mr. KNOX. What is the procedure asked? Is the resolution to be referred?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Rules and printed.

ACTIVITIES OF FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. KING. I offer the following resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The resolution (S. Res. 309) was read, as follows:

Whereas it has been reported that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has circularized hundreds of thousands of agriculturists in the United States and submitted questionnaires to them relating to diverse subjects: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what authority said Fourth Assistant Postmaster General had for his said action and what appropriation had theretofore been made to cover the expenses of such proceedings upon his part.

Mr. KING. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that I know of no authority to support what I understand has been done by the official referred to in the resolution and with respect to the matter to which the resolution refers. Officials are too prone to extend their authority and to engage in activities entirely outside of their legitimate field. I shall be glad if the committee will at an early date recommend the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed, as in open executive session, to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment offered to the first interpretation or reservation or amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the pending treaty with Germany comprises 15 separate parts, of which 2, part 1 and part 13, are devoted to the League of Nations. The importance of that subject during all discussions of the treaty, both in and out of the Senate, has largely overshadowed the remainder of the treaty, whose provisions are of equal concern to the country.

On the 22d of July last the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], and on the 29th of August following the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in two addresses of remarkable ability, directed the attention of the Senate to the political, military, and economic features of the treaty, which comprise the terms of peace between the Allies and Germany. Those speeches should have impressed the people of the United States with the great and controlling fact that the treaty comprises more—very much more—of concern to the peoples of the world than the mere subject of the proposed League of Nations, and that in and through the enforcement of its penalties the purposes to be subserved by the league would, in all probability, not only be defeated, but converted into an instrument making for a renewal of universal conflict.

Unfortunately, the public mind then, as now, absorbed by the problem of the league and unmindful of the parts of the treaty, either overlooked these graphic portrayals of the treaty for peace, or ascribed their luminous and accurate descriptions to a spirit of hostility to the league, or charged their authors with an unpatriotic sympathy for Germany, discreditable alike to their citizenship and their official duties. Hence it is appropriate that these features of the treaty be again reviewed, that the document in its entirety may be fully appreciated before a final vote is taken upon it.

The time which has elapsed between the presentation of the treaty to the Senate and the present is without precedent as regards final action upon an international document; but deplorable as this is said to be, I think that it has had at least one beneficial effect, in that the prejudices, the preferences, and the excitements aroused by its presentation and consideration by the Senate and people have partially subsided. They may now dispassionately concentrate their opinions and their reflections upon the treaty as a whole; and I am satisfied, Mr. President, when that shall be done, the insistence of the Senate upon full discussion, whatever the results upon the final determination of the treaty, will be commended and not condemned, for the treaty not only proposes to establish a League of Nations to which shall be committed the destiny of the peoples of the world, but it also makes final adjustment of all demands and controversies immediately affecting Germany and her allies. It therefore constitutes both a treaty of peace between the warring nations and a treaty designed to effectuate the permanent and lasting peace of the world; a treaty of penalties coupled with a treaty of universal and continuing international harmony; a treaty of penalties between combatants combined with a treaty of negotiation between all nations comprising vastly different objects and affecting the future of all the nations.

It is my purpose this morning, Mr. President, to direct the attention of the Senate once more, although I can not hope to do so as exhaustively and effectively as it has been done by others, to some economic features of the agreement imposed upon Germany, their character, and the probability or improbability of their ultimate execution, leaving to the judgment of the Senate the very important question whether, independently of the League of Nations, this document should command the assent of a two-thirds majority of the Senate of the United States.

On yesterday the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in his very illuminating and exhaustive address to the Senate, said:

> I confess some surprise in noting what seems to me a very decided change in the attitude of some Senators from that indicated at the time the war was in progress as to what terms should be imposed upon the country which was responsible for the millions of deaths and the billions of indebtedness.
> At the time the war was in progress the Senate seemed to be united in its conviction that there should be no terms of peace until Germany had been compelled to agree to a reparation to the full extent of her ability to make that reparation.

And that is true. From the commencement to the close of the war the people of the United States, their passions inflamed and their resentments aroused, took the attitude and made the demands which an individual under the influence of the same passions would assert against his adversary. Nay, the whole allied world, including nations great and small, their sensibilities influenced by repeated outrages, voiced a universal sentiment of vengeance and reprisals against the enemy. The spirit of væ victis, whose application in the centuries past has been the fruitful cause of nearly all the wars of civilization, then dominated all other considerations.

But from the 22d day of January, 1917, down to the conclusion of the armistice the voice of the President of the United States rose clearly and constantly above the universal chorus of retribution. He, speaking for America and the Allies, outlined the terms of peace to be demanded as essentials to the accomplishment of the objects of the conflict and to the permanent peace of the world. It was these sentiments which finally appealed to the conscience and the economic conditions of our enemies and forced their unqualified acceptance of his terms. When that acceptance became an accomplished fact the terms thereof bound each party to the compact legally and morally to the other. They formed, or should have formed, the clear, unyielding basis of every covenant to be written into the treaty which they foreshadowed. To understand clearly the situation, immediately preceding the armistice it is important that we should turn back for a moment to those utterances of the President which were translated into the preliminary formulas of peace. Four announcements at different times by Mr. Wilson constitute the composite conditions of an allied peace. These were accepted by the Central Empires, whereupon this war was terminated. Anterior to these utterances was one which the President made in this Chamber upon the 22d day of January, 1917, which, of course, antedated our entrance into the war. At that time he expressed the view that a lasting peace—> must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. I beg that I may be permitted to put my own interpretation upon it and that it may be understood that no other interpretation was in my thought. I am seeking only to face realities and to face them without soft concealments. Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance.

I do not refer to this announcement to create, even by implication, the thought that it should have been binding upon the Allies in their negotiation with Germany, except as the sentiment was reflected in after-war announcements. But the statement contains the germs of an eternal truth, written upon the cenotaphs of every treaty in recorded history which ignored its verities.

After we entered the war the new conditions necessarily relieved the country and the President from any commitments theretofore made, and especially those made in the sincere desire that our neutrality might lead to the end of the bloodiest war in history; but after our declaration of war and on the 8th day of January of the following year the President delivered his address embodying the famous 14 points, about which the world has since heard so much and concerning which it seems to have done so little. Mr. Wilson then said:

> The program of the world's peace, therefore, is our program; and that program, the only possible program, as we see it, is this:
>
> I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.
>
> II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas outside territorial waters alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.
>
> III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers, and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.
>
> IV. Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.
> V. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth points relate, respectively, to Russia, to Belgium, and to French territory which had been invaded, so it is not necessary to read them. The ninth and the tenth refer to the frontiers of Italy, and to—

> The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

The eleventh relates to the Balkan States; the thirteenth to the establishment of an independent Polish State—> which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

The fourteenth point recites that—

> A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

On the 5th day of February of the same year Lloyd-George, speaking for the British Government, virtually accepted the President's peace principles, and on the 8th they were discussed, respectively, by the chancellors of Germany and of Austria-Hungary.

Thereupon the President, on the 11th day of February, addressed the two Houses in joint session regarding the attitude of the chancellors of the two Central Powers upon the subject. This, Mr. President, the second of the President's announcements, and to which I think reference has not been specifically made in our discussions, is very important, equally so with any of the series.

The President on that occasion, among other things, so declared himself:

I mean only that those problems each and all affect the whole world; that unless they are dealt with in a spirit of unselfish and unbiased justice, with a view to the wishes, the natural connections, the racial aspirations, the security, and the peace of mind of the peoples involved, no permanent peace will have been attained. They can not be discussed separately or in corners. None of them constitutes a private or separate interest from which the opinion of the world may be shut out. Whatever affects the peace affects mankind, and nothing settled by military force, if settled wrong, is settled at all. It will presently have to be reopened.

Is Count von Hertling not aware that he is speaking in the court of mankind, that all the awakened nations of the world now sit in judgment on what every public man, of whatever nation, may say on the issues of a conflict which has spread to every region of the world? The Reichstag resolutions of July themselves frankly accepted the decisions of that court. There shall be no annexations, no contributions, no punitive damages. Peoples are not to be handed about from one sovereignty to another by an international conference or an understanding between rivals and antagonists. National aspirations must be respected; peoples may now be dominated and governed only by their own consent. "Self-determination" is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action, which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril.

The President then formulated four principles, not differing from those previously declared, but rather supplementary to and a development of them. He says:

The principles to be applied are these:

First, that each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of that particular case and upon such adjustments as are most likely to bring a peace that will be permanent;

Second, that peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game, now forever discredited, of the balance of power; but that

Third, every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival states; and

Fourth, that all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world.

On the 4th of July following, the President, in an impressive discourse at the tomb of Washington, again announced certain conditions essential to a satisfactory and lasting peace. He said:

There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No halfway decision would be tolerable. No halfway decision is conceivable. These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace:

I. The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or, if it can not be presently destroyed, at the least its reduction to virtual impotence.

II. The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

III. The consent of all nations to be governed in their conduct towards each other by the same principles of honour and of respect for the common law of civilized society that govern the individual citizens of all modern states in their relations with one another, to the end that all promises and covenants may be sacredly observed, no private plots or conspiracies hatched, no selfish injuries wrought with impunity, and a mutual trust established upon the handsome foundation of a mutual respect for right.

IV. The establishment of an organization of peace which shall make it certain that the combined power of free nations will check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that can not be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned.

These great objects can be put into a single sentence. What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind.

These great ends can not be achieved by debating and seeking to reconcile and accommodate what statesmen may wish, with their projects for balances of power and of national opportunity. They can be realized only by the determination of what the thinking peoples of the world desire, with their longing hope for justice and for social freedom and opportunity.

I come now to the President's fourth declaration, that of September 27, 1918, at New York. This is of special importance because of the emphasis laid upon it by the German authorities in their acceptance of the President's terms of peace. I shall not attempt to quote the entire document, although it may well be considered from its beginning to its close as comprising the propositions and conditions which finally moved the powers warring against us to an acceptance of terms and to subsequent negotiations for ending the war.

The President here said, among other things:

It is of capital importance that we should also be explicitly agreed that no peace shall be obtained by any kind of compromise or abatement of the principles we have avowed as the principles for which we are fighting. There should exist no doubt about that. I am, therefore, going to take the liberty of speaking with the utmost frankness about the practical implications that are involved in it.

If it be in deed and in truth the common object of the Governments associated against Germany and of the nations whom they govern, as I believe it to be, to achieve by the coming settlements a secure and lasting peace, it will be necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it, and ready and willing, also, to create in some virile fashion the only instrumentality by which it can be made certain that the agreements of the peace will be honored and fulfilled.

That price is impartial justice in every item of the settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with.

And so forth.

Later on, the President says—and these are noble words—

First. The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standard but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned.

Second. No special or separate interest of any single nation or any group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all.

Third. There can be no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the League of Nations.

Fourth. And more specifically, there can be no special, selfish, economic combinations within the league and no employment or any form of economic boycott or exclusion except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the League of Nations itself as a means of discipline and control.

Fifth. All international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world.

The President then adds this profound reflection:

Special alliances and economic rivalries and hostilities have been the prolific source in the modern world of the plans and passions that produce war. It would be an insincere as well as insecure peace that did not exclude them in definite and binding terms.

Thus spoke the President upon the 27th day of September. Nine days afterwards the German chancellor dispatched his first note to the President. It bears the signature of Prince Maximillian:

The German Government requests the President of the United States to take in hand the restoration of peace, acquaint all the belligerent States of the request, and invite them to send plenipotentiaries for the purpose of opening negotiations.

It accepts the program set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress on January 8, and in his later pronouncements, especially his speech of September 27, as a basis for peace negotiations. With a view to avoiding further bloodshed, the German Government requests the immediate conclusion of an armistice on land and water and in the air.

Mr. President, I well remember the effect of that momentous communication upon the public opinion of America. In general, it was apprehensive lest the President conclude negotiations with Germany unfavorable to America and inconsistent with complete victory. I do not recall that this expression was voiced in the Senate. Many newspapers, however, expressed it, and it became a general, common sentiment.

The President replied upon the 8th of October, two days afterwards; and just here let me ask permission to insert this entire diplomatic negotiation in the RECORD, although I shall quote from it very briefly. It is of immense importance, however, and enables us properly to comprehend the economic features of the treaty, and their divergence from the preliminary agreement between the warring nations.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Lansing, on behalf of the President, acknowledges the note, and also propounds certain questions:

Does the Imperial Chancellor mean that the Imperial German Government accepts the terms laid down by the President in his address to the Congress of the United States on January last, and subsequent addresses, and that its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon the practical details of their application?

The President feels bound to say, with regard to the suggestion of an armistice, that he would not feel at liberty to propose a cessation of arms to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated against the Central Powers so long as the armies of those powers are upon their soil. The good faith of any discussion would manifestly depend upon the consent of the Central Powers immediately to withdraw their forces everywhere from invaded territory. The President also feels that he is justified in asking whether the Imperial Chancellor is speaking merely for the constituted authorities of the Empire who have so far conducted the war.

On the 12th of October, four days afterwards, the German reply was received, from which I quote:

The German Government has accepted the terms laid down by President Wilson in his address of January 8 and in his subsequent addresses on the foundations of a permanent peace of justice. Consequently, its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon practical details of the application of these terms.

The rest I will not read, but will print it in the RECORD.

On the 14th of October the President, through Mr. Lansing, made public his reply to the last note. He says:

The unqualified acceptance by the present German Government and by a large majority of the German Reichstag of the terms laid down by the President of the United States of America in his address to the Congress of the United States on January 8, 1918, and in his subsequent addresses, justifies the President in making a frank and direct statement of his decision with regard to the communications of the German Government of October 8 and 12, 1918.

The reply is quite elaborate, and refers to details which perhaps are not of sufficient importance to justify my detaining the Senate in reading all of them; but he says, also:

It is necessary, also, in order that there may be no possibility of misunderstanding, that the President should very solemnly call the attention of the Government of Germany to the language and plain intent of one of the terms of peace which the German Government has now accepted. It is contained in the address of the President delivered at Mount Vernon on July 4 last. It is as follows:

"The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world, or, if it can not be presently destroyed, at least its reduction to virtual impotency."

He then insists that the old or prevailing form of government must be modified so as to comply with that condition, since otherwise there could be no safety in continuing the negotiation.

On the 20th of October, speaking for the German Government, Solf replied, accepting the condition of evacuation of occupied territory as a preliminary to peace negotiations.

The suggestions of the President are answered at length; some of his charges with regard to unlawful warfare are challenged, and the document concludes with this sentence:

The question of the President, with whom he and the Governments associated against Germany are dealing, is therefore answered in a clear, unequivocal manner by the statement that the offer of peace and an armistice has come from a Government which is free from any arbitrary and irresponsible influence and is supported by the approval of an overwhelming majority of the German people.

On the 23d of October the President answered this communication at length, from which I quote:

Having received the solemn and explicit assurance of the German Government that it unreservedly accepts the terms of peace as laid down in his address to the Congress of the United States on January 8, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses, particularly the address of September 27, and that it desires to discuss the details of their application and that this wish and purpose emanated not from those who have hitherto dictated German policy and conducted the present war on Germany's behalf but from ministers who speak for a majority of the Reichstag and for an overwhelming majority of the German peoples; and having received also the explicit promises of the present German Government that the humane rules of civilized warfare will be observed both on land and sea by the German armed forces, the President of the United States feels that he can not decline to take up with the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated the question of an armistice.

He then replies to the German communication at considerable length, and closes with this statement:

If it must deal with the military masters and the monarchial autocrats of Germany now, or if it is likely to have to deal with them later in regard to the international obligations of the German Empire, it must demand not peace negotiations but surrender.

On the 27th of October the German chancellor replied in a very brief note, saying that—

The German Government has taken cognizance of the answer of the President of the United States. The President is aware of the far-reaching changes which have been carried out and are being carried out in the German constitutional structure, and that peace negotiations are being conducted by a people's government in whose hands rests both actually and constitutionally the power to make the deciding conclusions. The military power are also subject to it. The German Government now awaits proposals for an armistice which shall be the first step toward a just peace as the President has described it in his proclamation.

At or before this time the President communicated these letters from the German Government to the allied powers, and prior to the 5th of November he had received appropriate replies. So upon that date he addressed a communication to the German Government which constitutes the understanding solemnly entered into between the United States and the allied powers acting through the agency of the President of the United States and all the powers engaged in war against the United States acting through the agency of the German chancellery. It is, therefore, important, Mr. President, that this entire document be fully considered. Fortunately, it is brief. It reads:

From the Secretary of State to the minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 5, 1918.

SIR: I have the honor to request you to transmit the following communication to the German Government:

"In my note of October 23, 1918, I advised you that the President had transmitted his correspondence with the German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that if those Governments were disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such armistice as would fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government had agreed, provided they deemed such an armistice possible from the military point of view.

"The President is now in receipt of a memorandum of observations by the allied Governments on this correspondence, which is as follows—

That memorandum is quoted in the letter. I read it:

"'The allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

"'Further, in the conditions of peace laid down in his address to Congress of January 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air.'"

That is the end of the allied note. Its acceptance of the German offer is emphasized by the exceptions which they carved out of it. It is, if possible, made the more binding because of its reservation of the freedom-of-the-seas clause of the President's proposal and the construction it demands for the restoration proviso:

I am instructed by the President to say that he is in agreement with the interpretation set forth in the last paragraph of the memorandum above quoted. I am further instructed by the President to request you to notify the German Government that Marshal Foch has been authorized by the Government of the United States and the allied Governments to receive properly accredited representatives of the German Government, and to communicate to them the terms of the armistice.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) ROBERT LANSING.

MR. HANS SULZER,
Minister of Switzerland, in charge of German interests in the United States.

Six days afterwards the armistice became an accomplished fact, because and only because these negotiations had finally led up to a distinct and specific understanding, a contract if you please, an agreement, a covenant mutually binding upon all of the parties to it, and which should have constituted the basis of all subsequent negotiations relating to the terms of settlement and the restoration of peace.

Mr. President, much has been said about the enormity of Germany's crimes, to all of which I gave the freest assent. Much has been said about the impossibility of the application of any adequate human punishment for them, and to that I also agree. Had the war terminated in a complete conquest, or had the German Government been told by the President during these negotiations that its unconditional surrender was demanded, that it was too late to accept his terms, that the changing fortunes of war had placed Germany and her allies at our mercy, and that they must therefore lay down their arms unconditionally and content themselves with any terms that we might offer, I could readily understand how a peace of penalties would have been justified by the dispassionate verdict of posterity; but we foreclosed ourselves against such an arrangement in the good moment that the President's letter of November 5 was delivered to the German authorities.

The President's terms of peace became by virtue of that fact the covenant between the warring nations, the measure and the limit of negotiations, the basis of all that should have proceeded therefrom.

In other words, the position of the United States in this particular was that of a contractor, an obligee, all of whose preliminary terms had been accepted and a few of which had been modified in the interest of its allies. If, therefore, the treaty of peace, which the Senate is called upon to ratify, squares with these conditions it is our duty to accept it. If, on the other hand, a treaty has been negotiated in disregard of many of these solemn covenants and obligations, then we must accept the treaty, if at all, upon some assurance or with the hope that in the future its penalties and severities may be mitigated, and that Germany shall not be held to the full and literal performance of all that has been imposed upon her or accept the consequences embodied in its voluminous recitals.

Mr. President, this preliminary statement has been somewhat tedious, but I deem it essential to a full or even to a partial understanding of many of the terms of the document. We must judge it in the light of history and of obligation. We must test it by the supreme and everlasting principles of equity and international justice, and that we should do, as far as it is in human nature possible to accomplish the task, with our minds entirely free from the passions and animosities which the horrible events of the war engendered and probably perpetuated.

I should, perhaps, before proceeding with the terms of the treaty, call the attention of the Senate to one incident which I overlooked. It is the cablegram from Premier Lloyd-George to President Wilson almost immediately after his dispatch of the letter of November 5. Mr. George said:

My heartiest thanks for your kindly message. I am certain that the ideals of our two countries regarding international reconstruction are fundamentally the same. I feel sure that at the peace conference we shall be able to cooperate fruitfully to promote the reign of peace with liberty and true democracy throughout the world.

That is somewhat general, but nevertheless a reaffirmation of the acceptance by the British Government of the terms and conditions under which the armistice was finally declared.

I have not the slightest doubt in the world that at the time of the armistice and for some time subsequent the allied Governments fully intended to observe their obligations and to stand by the President's propositions of peace. Unfortunately early in the month of December the British minister concluded to go to the country, as they call it, and a general election was called for that month. Evidently the Government had taken no note of, or had little heeded, the state of British public opinion. Britain had just emerged breathless and almost exhausted from the greatest war of her history. A vast proportion of her property had been swallowed up in the great conflict. The angel of death had imprinted its bloody cross upon the lintels of almost every household, and the terrible passions and animosities engendered by that awful conflict were then perhaps at their climax. Public sentiment demanded revenge and miscalled it justice. This demand became so insistent that Mr. George, himself a candidate for reelection, bent before the storm, and receding from or forgetting the pledged word of his Government, assured his great constituency that in the making of the treaty Germany should be compelled to make reparation to the utmost farthing. One of his great subordinates declared that by the treaty Germany should be squeezed as a lemon; and, further, that she "should be squeezed so hard we could hear her pips squeak"—language not elegant but entirely expressive. The election resulted in the vindication of Mr. George and his ministry, but it also carried with it a virtual repudiation of many of the provisions of the agreement for peace.

France, smarting under the same conditions many times aggravated and in mortal terror of her hereditary foe, was similarly inspired. The feelings of her people found not perhaps an electioneering vent, but it found full expression in the columns of every newspaper and from the lips of every public speaker and statesman in the Republic.

This was the atmosphere which enveloped the President of the United States when he entered the great city of Paris amid the plaudits of its millions of grateful population. It was an atmosphere filled with every phase of bitterness against the conquered, and hostile to the demands of justice founded upon the terms and conditions of the surrender.

The congress met and after the deliberations of months it finally presented to the German Government, whose delegates were not given a hearing, the document which I hold in my hand. That Government was required to take it as it was offered or hostilities would be renewed and the armies of the Allies would occupy their country. The treaty in the latter part of June was accepted under those conditions, although vigorous protest was made against some of its provisions, to which I will later call attention.

Let me now, Mr. President, proceed to a consideration of some of the salient features of this miscalled negotiated peace.

The second part of the treaty is devoted to the Saar Basin; a bit of territory that has been German since the fourteenth century; a bit of territory which during that long period of time was under French domination for a few months only; a bit of territory as essentially German as Paris is essentially French; but a bit of territory containing inexhaustible quantities of coal, necessary for the proper development of the iron mines of Lorraine. France demanded it, not as reparation, the recitals of article 45 to the contrary notwithstanding, for the destruction of her own mines, because that is provided for elsewhere in the treaty; she demanded it because the coal measures of that section were essential to the proper and prosperous development of the reacquired iron deposits of Alsace-Lorraine; and she got it; she is given it by article 45 of the treaty, which appears at page 24 of the Senate print of that document:

As compensation for the destruction of the coal mines in the north of France—

I have called your attention to the fact that that compensation is elsewhere provided for in the treaty—and as part payment toward the total reparation due from Germany for the damage resulting from the war, Germany cedes to France in full and absolute possession, with exclusive rights of exploitation, unencumbered and free from all debts and charges of any kind, the coal mines situated in the Saar Basin as defined in article 48.

Under the annex it is provided:

1.

From the date of the coming into force of the present treaty all the deposits of coal situated within the Saar Basin, as defined in article 48 of the said treaty, become the complete and absolute property of the French State.

* * * * * * *

The transfer will apply also to the debts owing for products delivered before the entry into possession by the French State, and after the signature of the present treaty, and to deposits of money made by customers, whose rights will be guaranteed by the French State.

Again, on page 28, it is provided:

11.

The mines and other immovable property which become the property of the French State may never be made the subject of measures of forfeiture, forced sale, expropriation, or requisition, nor of any other measure affecting the right of property.

There is a repurchase clause. Germany may, under certain conditions, of which France is largely the arbiter, after the lapse of 15 years, repurchase these deposits from France, upon a price to be agreed upon as provided in the treaty, by paying therefor the sum required in cash and in gold. The value of these mines is to be credited to Germany on the French indemnity by the reparation commission, which is the only provision favorable to Germany that can be found in the part covering the Saar Basin.

Mr. President, I think no man will question the right of the Allies to demand restitution and replacement from Germany. There is nothing in the agreement, there should be nothing in it, to militate against that proposition; but of the Saar Basin transaction it must be said that it is the application to Germany of the same character of restitution which she herself in 1871 imposed upon France. In other words, it is the repetition of the old Alsace-Lorraine episode with the parties reversed. I remember, as a young man, 21 years of age, reading French, British, and American press regarding the Alsace-Lorraine outrage. I recall the predictions then made that such a peace bred another war, and that war as soon as the recuperating energies of France justified her conviction that she could triumph.

The doctrine of revanche, passing from father to son from generation to generation among the French people, was born of that injustice, then and always condemned by the verdict of enlightened public opinion, and the righting of which became an essential to any peace which the Allies, through the fortunes of war, might be able to dictate. However, notwithstanding this fact, and in the face of the preliminary conditions of the peace which I have emphasized, the Versailles conference yielded to the demand of France, and more than three-quarters of a million of people, whose right of self-determination was not even suggested, together with this enormously valuable property, has passed, in my judgment, to the perpetual dominion of the French Republic, conditioned only upon the probability that Germany, when sufficiently powerful—Germany possessing the same elements of human nature—will inevitably renew hostilities, with Saar Basin instead of Alsace-Lorraine as the battle cry of her millions. I can find nothing, Mr. President, in all of the negotiations leading up to the proposed peace that, even by indirection, can justify the disregard of this principle.

What I say concerning the Saar Basin may be said with equal truth of the German colonies. Mr. President, the German colonies in Africa and in the Pacific aggregated 1,027,620 square miles, or about four times the area of the State of Texas. They are prolific in natural resources. They had been secured by the German people largely as the result of political negotiation; at any rate, they were confirmed by treaties between herself and other great powers possessing property in Africa. In one instance her possessions in the Pacific Ocean were recognized by negotiations with the Government of the United States. I refer to the Samoan Islands. The revenue of those colonies in 1914 aggregated $14,297,000; the expenditures were $35,375,000; their aggregate population was 13,777,300.

On the 8th day of January, 1918, the President declared as one of his 14 points that colonies should be dealt with from a standpoint of fairness and justice—I do not pretend to quote his exact language—and with due consideration for the peoples inhabiting them.

I thought, and many others felt, that under the terms leading to the armistice, the colonies might have been very properly used to compensate some of the Allies for the damages inflicted upon them by the war, and that by such a solution of the problem the transfer would relieve Germany of a part of her indemnity and be more than satisfactory to the countries which were the recipients; but the treaty provides by article 119:

Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her oversea possessions.

And for which, of course, she gets no credit, either by the Reparation Commission or by any of the principal allied and associated powers.

Under the treaty the United States becomes the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest in all of this vast territory, and, of course, upon the assumption that they would be dealt with by a League of Nations for the benefit and welfare of the inhabitants thereof; but the unfortunate truth is that, owing to a secret treaty between Japan and Great Britain, the former Government has acquired possession and control of all of them north of the Equator. All the remainder—and if I make a misstatement here I hope some Senator better informed will correct me—have passed to the British. They are to-day held under the British flag and occupied by British garrisons, as much a part of the British Empire as any of her other African or South Sea possessions.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. To indicate how partial that provision of the treaty is which gave over to the allied and associated powers all the overseas possessions of Germany, which treaty was signed in June, the fact is that on the 6th of May preceding the signing of the treaty the former German colonies were partitioned out to Japan, to Great Britain, and to France.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator for his valuable addition to the discussion, because it serves to emphasize the statements I have made concerning them.

These colonies owed an aggregate debt of $32,410,000, which was not assumed by the allied powers; in other words, they took the colonies and left Germany to pay the debt.

If we are treating with Germany, Mr. President, as a conquered nation deserving all the punishment that the power and vengeance of the Allies can inflict upon her, well and good; if, on the other hand, by our negotiations based upon our own terms we had agreed to extend the benefit of these terms to her, then I contend that no man living can justify the disposition made of the German colonies by this treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The treaty does not provide, does it, that Germany is to pay the debts of the various colonies?

Mr. THOMAS. It is silent on the subject, I think. I make that statement with some reservation. The treaty is so long and so involved that I can not retain it all in my memory.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it not follow, then, that the various colonies would assume their own debts?

Mr. THOMAS. That does not follow.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think, for instance, that if a colony in Africa had issued bonds, the colony would not owe the bonds but that Germany would owe them?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not understand that the colonial indebtedness is a bonded one, although it may be.

Mr. NORRIS. I may be mistaken about it. I should like to get correct information.

Mr. THOMAS. It is stated by a British author, whose book has recently attracted great attention—I allude to Mr. John Maynard Keynes—that, while the colonies are taken over by the Allies, the debt remains as a charge against Germany. It may be that this authority may not be reliable, but such as it is I give it to the Senate.

I come now, Mr. President, to the subject of reparation, and I may say that almost the entire treaty of peace with Germany may be translated in terms of reparation, restoration, restitution, and replacement. These four R's are made to spread over the entire nation, and under one or another of its forms all these demands may be postulated.

Reparation forms the subject of part 8, beginning at page 91, of Senate Document No. 49. By article 231—

The allied and associated Governments affirm and Germany accepts the responsibility of Germany and her allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the allied and associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies.

This is obviously true.

By article 232—

The allied and associated Governments recognize that the resources of Germany are not adequate after taking into account permanent diminutions of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present treaty, to make complete reparation for all such loss and damage.

The allied and associated Governments, however, require, and Germany undertakes, that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allied and Associated Powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied and associated power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea, and from the air.

So far so good; that is a repetition of one of the 14 points accepted by Germany and as modified by the Allies on the 5th of November; but there is added to it this pregnant clause:

And in general all damage as defined in Annex I hereto.

That I will comment upon hereafter.

In accordance with Germany's pledges, already given, as to complete restoration for Belgium, Germany undertakes, in addition to the compensation for damage elsewhere in this part provided for, as a consequence of the violation of the treaty of 1839, to make reimbursement of all sums which Belgium has borrowed from the Allied and Associated Governments up to November 11, 1918, together with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on such sums.

And we should make no complaint of that; it is a perfectly legitimate claim; it amounts in the aggregate to about twelve hundred and fifty millions of American dollars—or rather, I should say, dollars calculated in American coinage, because all the debt is not to us. The sum is larger than the indemnity imposed by Germany upon France in 1871, which, as I recall, was a thousand million dollars, or five milliards of francs.

This amount shall be determined by the reparation commission, and the German Government undertakes thereupon forthwith to make a special issue of bearer bonds to an equivalent amount payable in marks gold, on May 1, 1926, or, at the option of the German Government, on the 1st of May in any year up to 1926. Subject to the foregoing, the form of such bonds shall be determined by the reparation commission. Such bonds shall be handed over to the reparation commission, which has authority to take and acknowledge receipt thereof on behalf of Belgium.

In order to emphasize the power of the reparation commission, the next article, article 233, declares:

The amount of the above damage for which compensation is to be made by Germany shall be determined by an interallied commission, to be called the reparation commission and constituted in the form and with the powers set forth hereunder and in Annexes II to VII, inclusive, hereto.

Every demand that is to be recognized as a claim against Germany and made payable and paid under this treaty is to be determined by this commission, from whose conclusions there is and will be no appeal.

Mr. President, I do not pretend to be familiar with all history, and certainly not with the terms of treaties negotiated in the past between contending nations, but I think I am safe in asserting that never before have reparations and indemnities been thus provided for; that never before have the victors created an independent body and armed it with such tremendous and overwhelming authority over and control of the vanquished enemy. If there is anything in the letter of the President of November 5, 1918, to justify it, I have been unable to discover the passage. I shall refer, however, more fully to the reparation commission in connection with my consideration of Annex II.

Sections 234 to 242, inclusive, have reference to the subject of reparation. Section 236 makes Germany agree—to the direct application of her economic resources to reparation as specified in Annexes III, IV, V and VI, relating, respectively, to merchant shipping, to physical restoration, to coal and derivatives of coal, and to dyestuffs and other chemical products; provided always that the value of the property transferred and any services rendered by her under these annexes, assessed in the manner therein prescribed, shall be credited to her toward liquidation of her obligations under the above articles.

In other words, the entire application of all her economic resources is pledged to the carrying out of the terms of the treaty, and by section 240 Germany further agrees to provide for the salaries and expenses of the commission—that is, the reparation commission—and of such staff as it may employ.

Now, when we consider the vast powers of this commission, which virtually constitutes a receivership for 70,000,000 people, exclusive of Austria, and which is required to keep in constant touch with and control over the economic structure of those people, not for one but for a nameless number of years, tell me, if you please, of what its civil-service list will comprise? Will it not be the equivalent of the German civil-service list? Can it keep in touch with the interests and resources of that vast population unless it is represented, and fully represented, in every village, every community, every crossroads, and practically upon every man in the Empire? And when you consider that this reparation commission has also the same charge over Austria and Bulgaria and Hungary that it is given over Germany in this treaty, whereby both its power and its need of employment is increased by 50 per cent, tell me, if you please, what the burden upon Germany of all these expenditures will be without being permitted a voice in regard to either employment or compensation?

I do not know what the experience of other Senators is, but my influence has been requested by more than a dozen individuals anxious to serve this commission as soon as it is appointed. I have no doubt that the unemployed of every nation, and many of those employed, will congregate around the headquarters of this commission—which, by the way, is to be in Paris performing its duties, therefore vicariously. I have an idea that the number of appointments will not be strictly limited to the needs of the service, especially when somebody else must make the compensation. If there is anything in the negotiations leading up to the armistice which justifies this situation I am unable to find it. If this is a peace of vengeance, so be it; for one can not too frequently reiterate the fact that the offenses of Germany are beyond the power of human punishment. If it is good policy for the Allies, that might justify it; but that it is not even good policy, if it were justice, can easily be demonstrated.

Article 233 indicates the indeterminate character of the indemnity; and that, to my mind, is its worst feature. The Allies do not know what they will obtain. Germany does not know what her exactions are to be. A determinate sum of dimensions beyond the power of the conquered to pay would, in my judgment, be infinitely preferable to an indeterminate amount to be hereafter fixed upon and ascertained by an independent commission before which Germany may be heard, but can not vote; for in the one the nation paying the indemnity knows precisely what it has to pay, as in the case of the Franco-Prussian treaty, where the Prussian exaction was 5,000,000,000 francs. What greater calamity can rest upon a nation, especially after waging a great war, than the consciousness of an overpowering obligation, the amount and the terms of which are absolutely unknown? If human ingenuity can devise any punishment for Germany at all adequate with her offenses against civilization, this would approach the standard.

Let me call attention now for a moment to article 241. So much in this document relates to pains, penalties, and conditions that it is impossible, even with elaborate notes, to observe everything; but section 241, although short, caps the climax of the reparations sections or part of the treaty:

> Germany undertakes to pass, issue, and maintain in force any legislation, orders, and decrees that may be necessary to give complete effect to these provisions.

No matter what this reparation commission may determine, no matter what judgments it may pass, no matter how vast its staff of civil-service employees or how tremendous its possible exactions, Germany must crystallize them all into legislation of her own, and place behind their enforcement the sanction of her own laws and the authority of her own Government.

It may be necessary; I have no doubt it is essential if all these covenants are to be performed; but he who contemplates the possibility of a lasting and permanent peace by the establishment of friendly and amicable relations between the various nations of the earth, and bound together by a league wherein all may have a voice, and who at the same time imagines that a treaty of this character can comport with or produce these ideal conditions, is more of an enthusiast than am I; for I do affirm, Mr. President, that the basic principles of our poor human nature are immutable. Our loves, our hates, our passions, our sentiments, our emotions, are largely the same from generation to generation. Man has not the power to place such obstructions as these in a treaty and expect to overcome their inevitable consequences by any combination of nations, however constructed, or however lofty the sentiments upon which it may be founded. Just as surely as the restrictive and oppressive covenants of the Franco-Prussian treaty contained within themselves the germs of the last war, just so surely will their repetition against Germany bear the same bitter and bloody and awful fruit; the same causes operating upon the same human material must inexorably lead to the same result.

I recall that in 1870 the great German historian, Mommsen, was asked by a Frenchman what the immediate, concrete causes of the war were, and Mommsen replied: "You will find them in the history of the reign of Louis XIV." Prior to the days of Napoleon had the magnificent monarch sowed the seeds of that terrible harvest which culminated in the awful conflict of 1870-71; but we have learned nothing from it. The same old human nature which inspired Bismarck to the accomplishment of his treaty inspired Clemenceau and Lloyd-George to the creation of this one. I will not include the President. I am satisfied that the lofty principles, the motives, purposes, and ideals punctuating the addresses of the President, which I quoted this morning, animated him throughout the negotiation of this treaty, and that he yielded with much reluctance to these conventions, hoping that they might be cured or corrected by the League of Nations, upon the creation of which his heart was then, and is now, irrevocably set.

Now, as to compensation. Bear in mind, if you please, the clarification of one of the 14 points in the letter of November 5. Perhaps I had better refer to it again:

> Further, in the conditions of peace * * * the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the allied governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air.

That is perfectly plain—compensation to the civilian population as the result of German aggression by land, by sea, and from the air.

Annex I is devoted to compensation. It consists of 10 paragraphs. I will not read all of them. The first four have reference to damage caused to civilian population plus damages by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war. In other words, the first three items of compensation are in strict accord with the agreement of November 5 and made applicable to the civilian population, and also in accord with the President's assertion of February 7 that there should be no punishments and no indemnities, while the fourth indemnifies maltreated prisoners of war.

Subdivison 5, however, recites:

> As damage caused to the peoples of the allied and associated powers—

All of them. That would include the people of the United States.

> All pensions and compensation in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the air force), whether mutilated—

And so forth.

> (6) The cost of assistance by the Governments of the allied and associated powers to prisoners of war and to their families and dependents.
> (7) Allowances by the Governments of the allied and associated powers to the families and dependents of mobilized persons or persons serving with the forces.

This annex thus enlarges the covenant of November 5 as to damages by extending it to all of the people and all the armies of the allied and associated powers. Not a pension, no financial assistance of any sort granted to any of their people by Great Britain, by France, by Italy, by Belgium, by the United States, by Japan, but that is to be returned in kind or in value under the provisions of paragraphs 5, 6, and 7 of Annex I, and based upon the French rate of pensions and allowances then existing.

It has been said here with much pride, in which I have participated, that, however bad the treaty may be, the United States has made nothing out of it. Yet the United States under these provisions may demand from Germany the return of every penny which they have advanced or which they may advance by way of pensions and allowances during the war and because of it.

I wish some mathematician would calculate for me the amount of compensation which these items will impose upon Germany if they are enforced, tell me how she is to pay them, and then tell me how they are to be squared with the negotiations to which we have been solemnly committed by the common consent of all the Allied powers engaged in the war.

So much, Mr. President, for the manner in which the Allied and Associated Powers have construed, if I may use so polite an expression, their covenant with the Central Powers. It can be neither condoned nor justified.

Annex II defines the powers of the commission. Before I refer to that subject I want to call attention to a pamphlet which was forwarded to me yesterday from the pen of Mr. Miller, who signs himself as the legal adviser of the American representatives to the Paris conference. The article is a criticism of some of the conclusions of Mr. John Maynard Keynes, to whose book I have referred. It is a wonderful book, Mr. President. I do not vouch for its authority, but I believe it can be read with profit by every man, woman, and child in the United States, who can verify its accuracy at their leisure.

Mr. David Hunter Miller, legal adviser of the American peace commission, takes issue with Mr. Keynes upon a subject which makes criticism of it appropriate in connection with Annex II.

I call attention first to the facts which Mr. Miller cites in extenuation of the character of the treaty. He says:

Public sentiment is a fact. To yield to a wrong public sentiment may be a crime, but to adopt a course which, without yielding, permits sentiment to change and passions to cool is the part of wisdom.

He then refers to the conduct of the British election campaign and to the excitements which it created, the animosities which it aroused against Germany, and then delivers himself of this remarkable utterance:

The question presented to the framers of the treaty was whether the existence of this delusion—

That is the delusion of the popular mind—should be recognized by a form of the treaty which did not increase Germany's obligation to pay, but which left time for appreciation of realities by the allied peoples, or whether they should adopt another form of treaty and shock and enrage the sentiment of a public, suffering, depressed, and almost hysterical. The framers of the treaty chose the former course.

I do not wish to reflect upon Mr. Miller, whom I do not know, and who may be the ablest of advisers, but if this were a specimen of the counsel which he gave the commission I can better understand some of the conclusions which our delegates reached, because he virtually says that the Versailles congress on account of this hostile public sentiment had to do one of two things—defy it or deceive it; and under the circumstances they concluded to deceive it by pretending to comply with its requirements, feeling that they would be enlightened only when too late to help themselves. That may be a good thing in politics, although even there not entirely justifiable, but in a great congress dealing with the fate of nations I can not avoid the conclusion that it would have been better, far better, to have called the excited public mind of these countries to the unquestioned basis of the negotiations leading up to the armistice and adhering rigidly to their requirements.

But Mr. Miller continues:

Articles 231 to 233 relate simply to the total amount which Germany owes. As to payment, they are controlled wholly by annex 2 of part 8.

Which lead me to believe that Mr. Miller has forgotten the treaty, for the articles to which he refers are those which expressly clothe the reparation commission with authority to ascertain the amount owed by Germany, whether for restitution, for replacement, or for reparation, while annex 2 of part 8, instead of referring to payments, defines the powers and duties of the reparation commission.

Mr. Miller also declares that there is a practically fixed indemnity in the treaty amounting, according to his figures, to $13,101,000,000. He gets at it by this remarkable process:

I have called this the real indemnity, for it is of the utmost importance to distinguish the debt of Germany from the payment prescribed by the treaty.

It is not what Germany owes us, but what she is going to pay that matters, and that payment he says is "solely by means of bonds—which are extinguished pro tanto by deliveries of coal, ships, and so forth.

It is this vital distinction which Mr. Keynes misses. No bonds other than the 60,000,000,000 marks can be issued until the reparation commission is satisfied that Germany can meet the interest and sinking fund obligations thereof.

Mr. Miller also says:

The debt, so far as it is not to be paid, either principal or interest, is a figment of the imagination. It is the payment that matters, and nothing else.

That is to say, what we propose to obligate Germany for is of no consequence. What we are making her pay in bonds is the measure and limit of her responsibility.

Yet I find among other things in Annex II that—

Further issues by way of acknowledgment and security may be required as the commission subsequently determines from time to time.

I also find on page 101, in paragraph 23 of Annex II, the provision that, not when all payment is made, but—

When all the amounts due from Germany and her allies under the present treaty or the decisions of the commission have been discharged and all sums received, or their equivalents, shall have been distributed to the powers interested, the commission shall be dissolved.

I again suspect that this very capable gentleman is either not familiar with or has forgotten certain provisions of the treaty which absolutely overthrow his conclusions. It is not the bonds that we propose to exact from Germany which constitute the limit of her obligation. If it were, we could understand the amounts, and so could she. If it were, paragraph 23, which I have just read, means nothing. If it were, then article 430 never should have appeared in the treaty. Let us read that for a moment:

In case, either during the occupation or after the expiration of the 15 years referred to above, the reparation commission finds that Germany refuses to observe the whole or part of her obligations under the present treaty with regard to reparation, the whole or part of the areas specified in article 429 will be reoccupied immediately by the allied and associated forces.

That article is in part 14 entitled "Guarantees" and succeeds the article which provides for the occupation of what I think is called Rhenish Prussia, or that part of Germany which lies west of the Rhine. Here provision is made that if Germany fails in the performance of her obligations, not in the payment of her debt but in the performance of her obligations, her territory may be reoccupied indefinitely or until she shall recognize and perform them.

I am unable to derive much comfort from this document, which, in the language of Mr. Lincoln on a memorable occasion, seems to be "explanatory of explanations previously explained."

But Mr. Miller emphasizes the fact that the commission can only act unanimously, and that there can be no increase of these bond issues or of other obligations except it acts unanimously. If that were strictly so, it would relieve the situation somewhat, but unfortunately it is not true as to the crux of my discussion.

I read from page 99 of the Senate document:

On the following questions unanimity is necessary:

(a) Questions involving the sovereignty of any of the allied and associated powers or the cancellation of the whole or any part of the debt or obligations of Germany.

(b) Questions of determining the amount and conditions of bonds or other obligations to be issued by the German Government and of fixing the time and manner for selling, negotiating, or distributing such bonds.

(c) Any postponement, total or partial, beyond the end of 1930 of the payment of installments falling due between May 1, 1921, and the end of 1926, inclusive.

(d) Any postponement, total or partial, of any installment falling due after 1926 for a period exceeding three years.

(e) Questions of applying in any particular case a method of measuring damages different from that which has been previously applied in a similar case.

(f) Questions of the interpretation of the provisions of this part of the present treaty.

All other questions shall be decided by the vote of a majority.

Turning back for a moment to article 233, where the commission is endowed with the authority and duty to determine the amount of damage, and so forth, there is no imposition of unanimity. In other words, in the fixing of obligations a majority of the commission control, but in the matter of postponing payment or an additional issue of bonds unanimity is required. How then can it be said that the debt can not be increased by the reparation commission unless they act unanimously, unless we confuse the term "debt" or "obligation" with the term "bond issue," which obviously are distinct and separate conditions?

Let me now hurriedly proceed with Annex II, fixing the powers of the commission. I shall not read it all. Paragraph 12, consisting of paragraphs (a) to (f) inclusive, gives specific power and also wide latitude as to its control and disposition of the whole reparation problem as dealt with in this part of the present treaty. I have read the provision as to voting. I shall refer to but one more of them, although comment might be made with profit on each of them.

Paragraph 21 provides that—

No member of the commission shall be responsible, except to the Government appointing him, for any action or omission as such member. No one of the allied or associated Governments assumes any responsibility in respect of any other Government.

The commission is made not only supreme but it is irresponsible. As a commission its reports may be revised by no man, the only restraint imposed upon it by the treaty being that each Government shall have control over its own member thereof. Is it to be supposed that Great Britain or France or Belgium or Italy or Serbia will punish its member of the commission because of its moderation? All France has been led to believe that her debts will be paid and her currency redeemed by the German indemnity, thanks to this policy of deception which Mr. Miller glorifies.

A great portion of the British public believe the same thing, and Italy very largely. It is because of that conviction, artificially and falsely stimulated, that the currency complexities and problems of those countries to-day so very seriously threaten the economic structure of these great powers. But when the fact appears, as it must appear, that the enormity of these exactions, instead of bringing compensation will, doubtless, result in bankruptcy, when these people learn, as they must learn, that they must meet their obligations by a system of severe and excessive taxation and that the golden stream will not flow perpetually from Germany into their coffers, the economic, social, and political consequence may be better imagined than described. That, indeed, Mr. President, may be said to be the first bitter fruitage of these covenants.

I have called attention to the fact that the reparation commission, consisting of seven in number, of which four or five—four, I believe—will constantly act, is to have its permanent bureau or headquarters in Paris. Its proceedings are to be private; its powers are without limitation. Its members are given all diplomatic immunities. It is to be dissolved only when the last obligation imposed upon the Central Powers shall have been performed. It is required to keep in touch with and to acquire information regarding the whole economic life of the Central Powers—their manufactures, their agriculture, their banking, their transportation. In the event the Belgian indemnity is not paid in gold as required, they are given the power to seize any property, private or public, they please for that purpose—property existing before the war, property created during the war, or property amassed after war—and devote it to the liquidation of that demand.

This commission may enter the countinghouse of the merchant and take his goods; it may go into the banks and seize its coin; it may invade the manufactories and take possession of their product or machinery and remove them; it may acquire the remaining ships spared to Germany for her commerce. All these things it may do, so far as regards the Belgian indemnity, and it may do them with absolute impunity.

Did any commission or government, Mr. President, ever exist with its capital in an alien and hostile country, governing distant people without responsibility, the administration of whose powers was kept free from tyranny and oppression? Is it conceivable that such a government can be even popular?

The American Revolution was the glorious fruit of the tyrannies and oppressions of a distant governing power; yet, with that historical illustration to guide its footsteps, the Versailles congress placed the economic future, and therefore the political and industrial future, of 70,000,000 people in the hands of seven men, stationed in the capital of a hostile country, and given absolute powers of domination over a subject people. The Kaiser in the plentitude of his power, aye, Ivan the Terrible at the height of his infamous reign, the despotic administration of the Cæsars—none of those approached either the assertion or the exercise of so tremendous authority. Here is an autocracy compared with which those that have been dethroned were graphic examples of liberty and moderation. Here is a power which, while it may not directly decree the right of life and death, may, through its administration, desolate cities, communities, and provinces. I do not say it will do so; I am satisfied it will not; but if I interpret history aright, it is a terrible truth, justified by the experiences of nations and of individuals and sanctified by the blood of generations, that absolute power can not safely be intrusted in the hands of any man or of any body of men; yet we have created an organization compared with which the League of Nations, the power of which so many regard with apprehension, becomes comparatively innocuous, for by this commission a receivership has been created for two insolvent nations, empowered to administer their affairs for the benefit of creditors, whose claims the receiver is required to fix, and which until fixed remain indefinite and indeterminate; not impartial receivers appointed by an impartial tribunal but receivers belonging to and representing the nationalities whose demands make the receivership a requisite to their realization. Human nature, Mr. President, may be proof against the temptations and requirements of such a proposition, but the great American Republic, which pledged its honor to our adversaries in the letter of its President of November 5, 1918, should never lend the sanction of its approval to the establishment of such an authority. No such stain should tarnish the escutcheon of our country. Yet that is what we shall do in the event we shall determine to approve this treaty.

I think it is self-evident that Germany can only pay as her resources permit her. She must pay in specie or commodities. If the specie now in the German banks is removed, the very small and insufficient support upon which her gigantic monetary system is based will have been removed. The mark to-day, worth upon its face 23.8 cents, passes current at from 2 to 3 cents. When the reparation commission requires, if it does require, the transfer of the remaining stock of gold in Germany—and, by the way, the treaty forbids her exportation of any gold during its continuance—the result not only upon her monetary system but upon her business condition is too obvious to require comment. So she must pay in commodities; in other words, she must pay with such surplus as she may be able to produce beyond her own bare means of existence; and this she must exchange with those countries which are needing them and which are able to pay for them. In order to do this, even in small degree, it is obvious that her industries must be rehabilitated. But the treaty deprives her of 75 per cent of her iron resources. I am not complaining of that; that is just; she is deprived of them because they are located in Alsace-Lorraine, which France has had returned to her as an element of complete and tardy justice.

Another key industry has been largely despoiled, and that is coal. If the plebescite about to be held in Silesia shall result adversely to Germany, then that depletion will be considerably in excess, as I now recall, of 30 per cent. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] yesterday directed attention to the vast quantities of coal which Germany is required for a certain number of years to supply to France, to Belgium, to Luxemburg, and to Italy. It is not necessary, therefore, for me to repeat that; but all these things are cumulative upon Germany's powers of recuperation. If she has, comparatively speaking, no iron ore, her iron industries can only be revived by importations; if the great bulk of her coal must go by way of restitution—and that is all right also—the chances are that the 19,000,000 tons of coal hitherto furnished to Austria will be no longer available; and her manufacturing powers will be heavily curtailed; but the prime fact with regard to reparation is that this situation, instead of building up and stimulating, decreases and depresses all avenues of German production. If she must depend upon her commerce for reparation, she must not only produce the goods essential to that purpose but she must also be able to transport them, either in her own or in foreign bottoms. The treaty makes provision with regard to German shipping, however, and to that I will in this connection refer. Much of it was captured in foreign ports—foreign as regards to Germany—during the war; much of it she has since surrendered; but Annex 3, of part 8, provides:

> The German Government, on behalf of themselves and so as to bind all other persons interested, cede to the allied and associated Governments the property in all the German merchant ships which are of 1,600 tons gross and upward; in one-half, reckoned in tonnage, of the ships which are between 1,000 tons and 1,600 tons gross; in one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the steam trawlers; and in one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the other fishing boats.

These are to be credited upon reparation account, but it can easily be perceived what the effect of stripping that country bare of her merchant marine will have upon her powers of recuperation. You can not expect the workman to measure up to his requirements if you deprive him of his tools, nor the merchant of his commerce if you deprive him of his customers.

> The German Government will, within two months of the coming into force of the present treaty, deliver to the reparation commission all the ships and boats mentioned in paragraph 1.

But it may be said Germany may build ships; she has immense shipyards; she has men by the thousands skilled in the art of ship construction, and she can easily replace this tremendous drain upon her merchant marine. Paragraph 5, however, provides:

> (a) Within three months of the coming into force of the present treaty the reparation commission will notify to the German Government the amount of tonnage to be laid down in German shipyards in each of the two years next succeeding the three months mentioned above.

They may, if they see fit, designate the entire productive capacity of the German shipyards for this reparation during that period. They must, as to each of the three succeeding years, produce an amount of tonnage not to exceed 200,000 gross tons.

Of course, the depredations of the submarines were terrible; they were inhuman; they were indefensible; they destroyed allied and neutral shipping by the millions of tons. Naturally replacement is desirable; but if it comes by way of replacement in kind instead of fixed indemnities of money, it can only come as the treaty provides, first, by taking possession of practically all of the shipping of the country, or, second, by new construction, or both; and here we have relied upon both.

Now, apart from the coal which is to be delivered—and which, as I say, was amplified yesterday—I call attention to certain other drains to be made upon Germany's natural resources; and I commend this part of the treaty particularly to that class of the public which to-day are shivering, actually or by pretense, over the specter of an aroused German competition. I read from Annex 6:

> Germany accords to the reparation commission an option to require as part of reparation the delivery by Germany of such quantities and kinds of dyestuffs and chemical drugs as the commission may designate, not exceeding 50 per cent of the total stock of each and every kind of dyestuff and chemical drug in Germany or under German control at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty.
> This option shall be exercised within 60 days of the receipt by the commission of such particulars as to stocks as may be considered necessary by the commission.

In addition to that she must deliver to France during the next three years 35,000 tons of benzol, 50,000 tons of coal tar, and 30,000 tons of sulphate of ammonia.

Oh, ye dye men, who before the Finance Committee of the Senate have drawn such gloomy pictures of the terrors of the coming German dye competition, whose imagination sees boatload after boatload steaming with full power across the wide waste of the Atlantic Ocean, who demand embargoes and prohibitory tariffs to protect and preserve their industry from this destructive competition—let me ask if you know anything about the economic clauses of the pending treaty? If you do, pray tell me, if you can, after these deliveries to France, derived from a diminishing coal product, how much material Germany will retain in order to enable her to carry out and accomplish her fell commercial purpose?

But let us proceed:

Germany further accords to the reparation commission an option to require delivery during the period from the date of the coming into force of the present treaty until January 1, 1920, and during each period of six months thereafter, until January 1, 1925, of any specified kind of dyestuff and chemical drug up to an amount not exceeding 25 per cent of the German production of such dyestuffs and chemical drugs during the previous six months' period.

These clauses remind me of the old darky's coon trap. He set it in a peculiar way, and some one asked him why. "Because," he said, "I want to catch that animal if he is a-comin' or a-gwine"; and so with German chemicals.

Three. For dyestuffs and chemical drugs delivered under paragraph 1, the price shall be fixed by the commission, having regard to prewar net export prices and to subsequent increases of cost.

For dyestuffs and chemical drugs delivered under paragraph 2, the price shall be fixed by the commission, having regard to prewar net export prices and subsequent variations of cost or the lowest net selling price of similar dyestuffs and chemical drugs to any other purchaser.

Four. All details, including mode and times of exercising the options and making delivery and all other questions arising under this arrangement, shall be determined by the reparation commission. The German Government will furnish to the commission all necessary information and other assistance which it may require.

Five. The above expression, "dyestuffs and chemical drugs," includes all synthetic dyes and drugs and intermediate or other products used in connection with dyeing, so far as they are manufactured for sale.

That would seem to be ample; but, in order to make good measure, it is further provided that—the present arrangement shall also apply to cinchona bark and salts of quinine.

Neither of which, I believe, is produced in Germany.

Will Germany be able to meet her indemnities, therefore, by her export trade in chemicals and dyestuffs? Before the war they amounted to a little over $51,000,000 in the highest year of exportation. With this emasculated remainder it will be a remarkable performance, in my judgment, if during the period of the operation of this particular clause she will be able to manufacture enough for her own purposes.

Mr. President, modern commerce depends largely upon means of communication. In these days the thoughts of men are transported around the world in an instant of time; and Germany, as a commercial nation, provided and equipped herself with the modern methods of communication, to the end that her great business might prosper. But by Annex 7 she is made to renounce—

On her own behalf and on behalf of her nationals in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all rights, titles, or privileges of whatever nature in the submarine cables set out below, or any portions thereof.

Then follows a list of cables reaching almost every point of importance in the world. Under this treaty, those are taken absolutely from Germany and from her nationals, and the renunciation is made in favor of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. She may communicate, of course, by using these lines under foreign control, by contributing to their exchequer on the one hand and revealing all of her commercial secrets upon the other. She may trade, but she does so at a disadvantage which places her completely at the mercy of her conquerors and diminishes pro tanto her powers either of recuperation or of replacement.

Part IX refers to financial clauses, or is so entitled. I shall take but little time regarding that and merely emphasize the recitals of one or two articles. The first provides that—

Subject to such exceptions as the reparation commission may approve, a first charge upon all the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent States shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the treaty or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto or under arrangements concluded between Germany and the allied and associated powers during the armistice or its extensions.

Then follows the prohibition against the export of gold to which I have referred.

All other of the above costs—

Says article 249—

shall be paid in gold marks.

Article 251 fixes priorities. The first is—

The cost of the armies of occupation, as defined under article 249, during the armistice and its extensions.

The second is—

The cost of any armies of occupation, as defined under article 249, after the coming into force of the present treaty.

The third is—

The cost of reparation arising out of the present treaty—

Which includes, of course, the expenses of the enormous civil-service force which the reparation commission must inaugurate if they are to perform their duties.

The fourth covers—

The cost of all other obligations incumbent on Germany under the armistice conventions or under this treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto.

The costs of the armies of Allies in occupation, the costs of the execution of the receivership; all these things are first liens upon the resources of Germany, and, of course, must precede the principal part of her burden, which is indemnification.

We have, therefore, concretely stated—

1. The payment of all advances to Belgium.

2. The cost to the Allies of the war, including pensions and allowances, whether they relate to their civil or their military populations.

3. The surrender of these various items to which I have referred, and others which might be mentioned; and, of course, she must also conduct her own civil administration, an expenditure which before the war was very considerable, even after you have excluded the cost of the Army and Navy. What wonder, therefore, Mr. President, that these indemnities should be so indefinite and so enormous in their aggregate?

But let me turn, because the tax upon my strength tells me that I must soon conclude, to the economic clauses found on pages 117 to 122, inclusive; and to these, also, I will refer very briefly.

Article 267 provides that—

Every favor, immunity, or privilege in regard to the importation, exportation, or transit of goods granted by Germany to any allied or associated State or to any other foreign country whatever shall simultaneously and unconditionally, without request and without compensation, be extended to all the allied and associated States.

In other words, if Germany for any reason sees fit to make a special arrangement or treaty with any country in the world, and it is to her interest to bestow some particular favor or privilege upon that nation in order to secure the agreement, the same privilege automatically applies to all the allied and associated powers. If Germany to-morrow should, in her extremity, see fit to make a treaty, we will say, with Denmark, a contiguous neighbor, and her necessity should require her to extend particular privileges to Denmark in order to secure a needed commerce, that privilege instantly becomes the property of all the allied countries; and I may say here that every provision is made for the entry into Germany, without excessive and sometimes without any tariffs, of all the goods of the allied nations, but corresponding privileges are not given to her. Indeed, under chapter 3 she is required—

To adopt all the necessary legislative and administrative measures to protect goods the produce or manufacture of any one of the allied and associated powers from all forms of unfair competition in commercial transactions.

We have heard much about unfair competition, and unquestionably Germany was a master hand at it before the war. Unfair competition should be repressed everywhere and under all circumstances.

But we do not agree to repress it in favor of Germany; we require Germany to repress it in favor of all of the allied countries. There is no reciprocity about it. On the contrary, article 281—in some respects one of the most remarkable articles in the treaty—provides in terms that—

If the German Government engages in international trade, it shall not in respect thereof have or be deemed to have any rights, privileges, or immunities of sovereignty.

In other words, German international trade, which must be the basis of her powers of reparation, must be conducted by Germany as a nation, if at all, just as the obscurest individual in France or Italy or the United States or England can do so. The advantages appertaining to nationality in commerce, the prestige to which every nation is entitled if endowed with any sort of power or self-respect, the individuality which it has the right to assume in all commercial transaction, is by this treaty taken from Germany; and the conclusion is and must be that under this treaty Germany as a commercial competitor of the allied nations is to be wiped out. We must conclude that under this treaty her reassertion of commercial supremacy will be absolutely impossible.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, this punishment, however merited, operates like a two-edged sword. I do not believe that it would make for the prosperity of Washington if 50,000 of its people were reduced to penury, or if they were forbidden, by practically prohibitive restrictions, from carrying on the ordinary affairs of life. Not only would our sympathy be aroused, but our self-interest would be quickened, as we perceived that such a condition, while terrible in its effects upon those immediately concerned, is quite as serious to the rest of the community. Hence it would not be tolerated, and so with nations. If you destroy the power of a nation to sell you render it incapable of purchase. If you impoverish your neighbor from whatever motive, you deprive yourself and the community of the benefit of his prosperity. I do not think it would surprise the Senate to be told that Germany was our third best customer before the war, our exports to which amounted to over $425,000,000 and our imports from which were about one-third of that sum. Perhaps Senators from the South may be interested in knowing that the year before the war Germany's imports of cotton were over $151,000,000. Perhaps it will interest those living in the West to know that her imports of wool were $118,000,000 and of hides and skins $124,000,000, and that her total import trade was $2,692,000,000 as against $2,524,000,000 of her export trade.

Do you want to preserve that market or are our animosities so great and our disregard of our treaty obligations so complete that her destruction is preferable to her trade? If so, then the treaty should be ratified. If the people of the South desire to contract their market for cotton to the extent of over $150,000,000, and if others desire to make similar restrictions, then what the treaty does to Germany will give them complete and supreme satisfaction. If, on the other hand, we want her to pay, as she should pay, a large round sum by way of indemnity, or call it what you please, if we are even selfishly interested in the prosperity of over 70,000,000 of people, regardless of their offenses against humanity, then this treaty should never become effective. You may look at it from the standpoint of national honor or from that of national selfishness, if you please, or both, but you can not escape the conclusion in either instance.

Now, let me refer for a moment to Part XII, regarding ports and waterways, beginning on page 157 of the Senate print. This part of the treaty requires practically free ports for all allied and associated shipping in Germany, where—

> The seaports of the allied and associated powers are entitled to all favors and to all reduced tariffs granted on German railways or navigable waterways for the benefit of German ports or of any port of another power.

Free ports which are reciprocal are, in my judgment, a great international blessing. I wish they might have been established before the war. They can not be established too soon now in the interest of international trade. They can not be one-sided, however, for if they are it would be better not to create them at all.

This part of the treaty, however, is not wholly confined to the matter of free ports, but it internationalizes all the great rivers of Germany. It makes them open to the commerce of the world and practically without restriction. Jurisdiction over each of them is invested in a commission composed of nationals of all countries to which the rivers are tributary. But Germany is in the minority upon each commission, and therefore the Allies will control them. Our goods, our passengers, our commerce, destined to ports either in or on the other side of Germany, are given by the treaty the same facilities upon her great rivers that the American public to-day enjoys upon the Mississippi, that the people of Great Britain enjoy upon the Thames, or those of France upon the Seine.

Now, the internationalization of all the rivers in Europe controlled by impartial commissions would be a distinct international continental benefit, but the control by all others of the streams of one nation, subjecting them to burdens which can not be interfered with by the nation itself, may be punishment, and deserved punishment, but it is not justice if justice is to be considered, as it should be considered, in the preliminary arrangement of terms of peace.

There is one feature, however, of the river situation that I desire to emphasize before the Senate. Bear in mind that under the other provisions of the treaty 25 per cent of the river boats have been required to be surrendered by way of reparation.

Article 339 provides that—

> Germany shall cede to the allied and associated powers concerned, within a maximum period of three months from the date on which notification shall be given her, a proportion of the tugs and vessels remaining registered in the ports of the river systems referred to in article 331—

That is, the internationalized rivers—

> after the deduction of those surrendered by way of restitution or reparation, Germany shall in the same way cede material of all kinds necessary to the allied and associated powers concerned for the utilization of those river systems.

In addition to this 25 per cent we now take a proportion of the tugs and vessels and material of all kinds necessary to the allied and associated powers concerned for the utilization of the river systems. What that material is, its character, its locus, the extent to which it can be used, are all indefinite. Let us see who determines it. Listen, Senators:

> The number of the tugs and boats and the amount of the material so ceded and their distribution shall be determined by an arbitrator or arbitrators nominated by the United States of America, due regard being had to the legitimate needs of the parties concerned, and particularly to the shipping traffic during the five years preceding the war.

The United States, through the agency of whose President, representing all of the allied and associated powers, the preliminaries of the treaty were negotiated, and which pledged to the Central Powers before the armistice the application of the principles of the President's speech of January 8, and subsequently and particularly his address of September 27, 1918—this Government, whose sacred word was pledged to carry out the terms and conditions of that preliminary agreement, is by the treaty charged with the responsibility of determining how many of Germany's remaining tugs and boats and how much of this material essential for the utilization of these international streams shall be appropriated by the allied and associated powers. Is that consistent with the assurances which were given on the 5th day of November? If matters were reversed and this condition were made applicable to America by Germany, no argument would be required to convince the dullest mind in America of the irreconcilable inconsistency of such a provision with the understanding of November 5. Yet there it is written, and those who are prepared to accept the treaty and then trust in God and the League of Nations for justice regardless of our covenant are willing to take a greater chance than am I, for I do verily believe that if the treaty becomes effective under the sign manual of the Senate of the United States posterity will justly hold the Members of this body to full responsibility for accepting a treaty which in so many respects does violence to the understanding upon which, and upon which alone, any treaty could have been negotiated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I sympathize very much with some of the statements made by the Senator as to the severity of the terms of the treaty. But assuming for the sake of the argument that the armistice was based on the correspondence to which the Senator has referred and that the treaty utterly fails to live up to the letter and spirit of that correspondence and the declarations made by Mr. Wilson, to which the Senator has also referred, and assuming that the treaty is harsh and unduly severe upon Germany, does not the Senator believe that Germany's position will be very much better and that the terms of the treaty will be softened and its severities will be eviscerated if the United States becomes a signatory to the treaty and we enter into the league?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from Utah, in all sincerity, how that mode of reasoning can be adopted when it was the United States which became a participant in the making of the treaty and imposing the terms? We had an infinitely better opportunity to refuse to make the terms than we will have to change the terms after they have been ratified.

Mr. THOMAS. I am obliged to the Senator from Idaho for answering the question, to which I will add another observation. I am not concerned about the severity of the terms of the treaty on Germany. So far as Germany is involved I do not care so much how severe they may be, because, as I have said, she merits any punishment that may be imposed upon her. I am concerned for my own country, for the position which it assumed and in consequence of which the surrender was effected. I am not much of a hand, Mr. President, to accept an unsatisfactory agreement and then to depend upon time and chance and Providence for its amelioration.

I have a lively recollection that in 1899 or 1900 the distinguished leader of the party to which I belong resigned his commission in the Army, came to Washington, and by his influence secured ratification of the treaty with Spain, which delivered to the United States 20,000,000 of reluctant people and a huge outpost in the Orient, and which, in my judgment, was our first abandonment of the Monroe doctrine. That very able and enthusiastic statesman not only labored under the delusion but made all over the country the assertion that with the ratification of the treaty the American people would recognize the independence of the Philippines, fill their purse with treasure, and tell them to go on their way rejoicing. Yet I have a lively recollection that we still own the Philippines. They have been a burden to us ever since, and I doubt whether we shall ever get rid of them.

No; take no chances. A burnt child dreads the fire. In my judgment the way to meet this difficulty is to tell the world why we object to the treaty and quit pivoting our discussion upon Part I, because in doing so we have emphasized the importance of that part out of all proportion to the rest of the treaty, moreover, and have delivered an opiate to the American people, unconsciously, of course, and dulled their senses to the merits of this document as a treaty of peace with Germany.

Now, the German commissioners at Versailles thus concluded their protest against the economic covenants of the treaty.

German democracy is thus annihilated at the very moment when the German people was about to build it up after a severe struggle—annihilated by the very persons who throughout the war never tired of maintaining that they sought to bring democracy to us. * * * Germany is no longer a people and a State, but becomes a mere trade concern placed by its creditors in the hands of a receiver, without its being granted so much as the opportunity to prove its willingness to meet its obligations of its own accord. The commission, which is to have its permanent headquarters outside Germany, will possess in Germany incomparably greater rights than the German Emperor ever possessed; the German people under its régime would remain for decades to come shorn of all rights and deprived to a far greater extent than any people in the days of absolutism of any independence of action, of any individual aspiration in its economic or even in its ethical progress.

Mr. President, I have tried in my own mind to formulate a fitting answer to this conclusion. I have been unable to do so when I contrast these phrases with the diplomatic correspondence which preceded the armistice and to which I devoted some time this morning.

I contend, Mr. President, in conclusion, that the terms of the treaty can not be made to square with the German-Allied pre-armistice understanding. I contend that the injustices and oppressions of the Franco-Prussian treaty formed the source of the recent war, and these we have sanctioned and multiplied manyfold in the economic clauses of the treaty. In the language of the President, have we been just to those to whom we did not wish to be just, or have we forgotten or disregarded the principles of that lofty and elevating sentiment? Have we considered what the blight of these conditions will be upon the enterprise and prosperity of the conquered peoples?

If, through an indefinite future, every dollar over the bare means of existence earned by every citizen of America were by some covenant, which we were obliged to accept, diverted from our pockets to a foreign treasury, there to be used to liquidate an obligation, the total amount of which no man could know, what effect would it have upon the morale, the integrity, the enterprise, and the future of the people of this Republic? Were we deprived of the energizing influence of the desire to succeed, which is the ambition of every free man and which underlies the foundation of progress and prosperity the world over, we would stagnate, then retrograde, then disappear as an independent people.

This treaty, in my judgment, must necessarily destroy the economic structure not only of Germany but of all the peoples of central Europe which are dependent upon and associated with it. Their means of progress and of production have been largely reduced, and in some instances have been almost totally destroyed. Their initiative must inevitably disappear under the oppressive burdens of these exactions. Their government will be a government in name only, for it is to be administered, subject to no protest or reproach upon their part, by this mighty commission, whose headquarters, by the treaty, are placed upon alien soil.

Do not forget, Senators, that these economic conditions are duplicated in the treaty soon to be laid before the Senate relating to Austria. That unhappy country, justly suffering in retribution for an awful crime, to-day presents a spectacle that must excite the sympathy and the commiseration of every well-directed mind.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Montana in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that before he concludes he put into his magnificent address, in order that those who will in the future read it may have it before them in the consideration of the other matters to which he has alluded, the constitution of the reparation commission, to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator mean the part of the treaty making provision for the reparation commission?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. The Senator has referred to it very extensively, but he has nowhere stated exactly how that commission is constituted.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be glad to do so, and I ask permission that I may insert it at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ANNEX II.

1.

The commission referred to in article 233 shall be called "the reparation commission" and is hereinafter referred to as "the commission."

2.

Delegates to this commission shall be nominated by the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. Each of these powers will appoint one delegate and also one assistant delegate, who will take his place in case of illness or necessary absence, but at other times will only have the right to be present at proceedings without taking any part therein.

On no occasion shall the delegates of more than five of the above powers have the right to take part in the proceedings of the commission and to record their votes. The delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have this right on all occasions. The delegate of Belgium shall have this right on all occasions other than those referred to below. The delegate of Japan shall have this right on occasions when questions relating to damage at sea, and questions arising under article 260 of Part IX (financial clauses) in which Japanese interests are concerned, are under consideration. The delegate of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State shall have this right when questions relating to Austria, Hungary, or Bulgaria are under consideration.

Each Government represented on the commission shall have the right to withdraw therefrom upon 12 months' notice filed with the commission and confirmed in the course of the sixth month after the date of the original notice.

Such of the other allied and associated powers as may be interested shall have the right to appoint a delegate to be present and act as assessor only while their respective claims and interests are under exmination or discussion, but without the right to vote.

4.

In case of the death, resignation, or recall of any delegate, assistant delegate, or assessor, a successor to him shall be nominated as soon as possible.

5.

The commission will have its principal permanent bureau in Paris and will hold its first meeting in Paris as soon as practicable after the coming into force of the present treaty, and thereafter will meet in such place or places and at such time as it may deem convenient and as may be necessary for the most expeditious discharge of its duties.

6.

At its first meeting the commission shall elect, from among the delegates referred to above, a chairman and a vice chairman, who shall hold office for one year and shall be eligible for reelection. If a vacancy in the chairmanship or vice chairmanship should occur during the annual period, the commission shall proceed to a new election for the remainder of the said period.

7.

The commission is authorized to appoint all necessary officers, agents, and employees who may be required for the execution of its functions, and to fix their remuneration; to constitute committees, whose members need not necessarily be members of the commission, and to take all executive steps necessary for the purpose of discharging its duties; and to delegate authority and discretion to officers, agents, and committees.

8.

All proceedings of the commission shall be private, unless, on particular occasions, the commission shall otherwise determine for special reasons.

9.

The commission shall be required, if the German Government so desire, to hear, within a period which it will fix from time to time, evidence and arguments on the part of Germany on any question connected with her capacity to pay.

10.

The commission shall consider the claims and give to the German Government a just opportunity to be heard, but not to take any part whatever in the decisions of the commission. The commission shall afford a similar opportunity to the allies of Germany, when it shall consider that their interests are in question.

11.

The commission shall not be bound by any particular code or rules of law or by any particular rule of evidence or of procedure, but shall be guided by justice, equity, and good faith. Its decisions must follow the same principles and rules in all cases where they are applicable. It will establish rules relating to methods of proof of claims. It may act on any trustworthy modes of computation.

12.

The commission shall have all the powers conferred upon it, and shall exercise all the functions assigned to it, by the present treaty.

The commission shall in general have wide latitude as to its control and handling of the whole reparation problem as dealt within this part of the present treaty and shall have authority to interpret its provisions. Subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the commission is constituted by the several allied and associated Governments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above as the exclusive agency of the said Governments respectively for receiving, selling, holding, and distributing the reparation payments to be made by Germany under this part of the present treaty. The commission must comply with the following conditions and provisions:

(a) Whatever part of the full amount of the proved claims is not paid in gold, or in ships, securities, and commodities or otherwise, Germany shall be required, under such conditions as the commission may determine, to cover by way of guarantee by an equivalent issue of bonds, obligations or otherwise, in order to constitute an acknowledgement of the said part of the debt.

(b) In periodically estimating Germany's capacity to pay, the commission shall examine the German system of taxation, first, to the end that the sums for reparation which Germany is required to pay shall become a charge upon all her revenues prior to that for the service or discharge of any domestic loan, and secondly, so as to satisfy itself that, in general, the German scheme of taxation is fully as heavy proportionately as that of any of the powers represented on the commission.

(c) In order to facilitate and continue the immediate restoration of the economic life of the allied and associated countries, the commission will as provided in article 235 take from Germany by way of security for and acknowledgement of her debt a first instalment of gold bearer bonds free of all taxes and charges of every description established or to be established by the Government of the German Empire or of the German States, or by any authority subject to them; these bonds will be delivered on account and in three portions, the marks gold being payable in conformity with article 262 of Part IX (financial clauses) of the present treaty as follows:

(1) To be issued forthwith, 20,000,000,000 marks gold bearer bonds, payable not later than May 1, 1921, without interest. There shall be specially applied toward the amortization of these bonds the payments which Germany is pledged to make in conformity with article 235, after deduction of the sums used for the reimbursement of expenses of the armies of occupation and for payment of foodstuffs and raw materials. Such bonds as have not been redeemed by May 1, 1921, shall then be exchanged for new bonds of the same type as those provided for below (paragraph 12, c, (2)).

(2) To be issued forthwith, further 40,000,000,000 marks gold bearer bonds, bearing interest at 2½ per cent per annum between 1921 and 1926, and thereafter at 5 per cent per annum with an additional 1 per cent for amortization beginning in 1926 on the whole amount of the issue.

(3) to be delivered forthwith a covering undertaking in writing to issue when, but not until, the commission is satisfied that Germany can meet such interest and sinking fund obligations, a further instalment of 40,000,000,000 marks gold 5 per cent bearer bonds, the time and mode of payment of principal and interest to be determined by the commission.

The dates for payment of interest, the manner of applying the amortization fund, and all other questions relating to the issue, management, and regulation of the bond issue shall be determined by the commission from time to time.

Further issues by way of acknowledgment and security may be required as the commission subsequently determines from time to time.

(d) In the event of bonds, obligations, or other evidence of indebtedness issued by Germany by way of security for or acknowledgment of her reparation debt being disposed of outright, not by way of pledge, to persons other than the several Governments in whose favor Germany's original reparation indebtedness was created, an amount of such reparation indebtedness shall be deemed to be extinguished corresponding to the nominal value of the bonds, etc., so disposed of outright, and the obligation of Germany in respect of such bonds shall be confined to her liabilities to the holders of the bonds, as expressed upon their face.

(e) The damage for repairing, reconstructing, and rebuilding property in the invaded and devastated districts, including reinstallation of furniture, machinery, and other equipment, will be calculated according to the cost at the dates when the work is done.

(f) Decisions of the commission relating to the total or partial cancellation of the capital or interest of any verified debt of Germany must be accompanied by a statement of its reasons.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, Austria's indemnity also is indefinite; it is to be ascertained by the same commission in the same way, and the results, whatever they may be, are eagerly waited for by the countries which she has devastated, and particularly by Serbia and Italy. However much they may differ regarding Fiume, their interests and their hopes are identical when turned in the direction of Vienna. If ever a country, Mr. President, paid penance for its crimes, if ever a nation which drew the sword perished by the sword, if ever consequences due to the violation of the eternal laws of justice and of right were inflicted upon a great and mighty people, that people is the late powerful, puissant empire of Austria. To-day her people are starving, her women with their babes are perishing from hunger and cold and want in the streets of her mighty cities. Yet we are contemplating a treaty whose economic consequences must aggravate, if that be possible, the terrible measure of her misery and her want.

Mr. President, I was a boy at the close of the Civil War. I remember the passions of the Northern people aroused in fully as great a measure against the people of the South as were those of all our people against the Central Powers during and immediately after the recent war. It was seriously proposed in the Congress following Lee's surrender to reduce the Southern States to provinces; to make the Confederate uniform the badge of the convict in all the prisons of the land; to try and execute the late president of the Confederacy and his chief military officers for treason; to disfranchise the whites and to enfranchise the blacks; and to take the property left after war's destruction to remunerate the North for the tremendous expense of the war. Does anyone imagine that had that policy been effectuated, the integrity of the Union would long have been preserved? The great heart of the mighty people of the South responded to the music of the Union in the dread days of the Spanish and the German Wars; their sons and their treasures gladly and willingly merged with those of the North in upholding American institutions and the honor of the American ensign; but does anyone believe for a moment that that would have been possible had this policy of punishment and of vengeance been followed to its logical conclusions?

Mr. President, I can never forget the morning when the news flashed across the wires that the late president of the Confederacy had been fettered and imprisoned at Fortress Monroe. The feelings of the people of the South everywhere rose in spontaneous protest, in vindictiveness, in animosity toward the National Government, and even to-day those feelings have not fully subsided. No; after the bitterness engendered by the war was over the great heart of the North responded in sympathy and affection, in assistance and cooperation, to and with their stricken brethren of the late Confederacy, and, like the good Samaritan, they finally ministered unto them and lifted them to their feet. It required but the cry of war in 1898 to exhibit to the world the spirit of a reunited people bound in one common destiny and owing allegiance to a single flag—the result of forbearance, of sympathy, and of forgetfulness. We may contrast the one condition with the other, with much benefit to ourselves, and, I think, with an almost certain prescience that like creates like in human nature everywhere.

Mr. President, I shall doubtless be accused of an undue sympathy with the conquered powers. I have never yet endured the reproach of pro-Germanism, but I have no doubt it will be cast upon me on the morrow. I do not question that the enormities of Germany's crimes will be sung in chorus throughout the land as a complete and effective rejoinder to anything that may be offered against the oppressive covenants of this treaty.

I have been a reluctant speaker, Mr. President, upon this subject; I have shrunk from its consideration and indulged the hope that the task might fall upon other shoulders; but, inasmuch as the treaty is again before the Senate for consideration, and inasmuch as I have given many painful and anxious hours to its consideration since it was disposed of in November and have reached the convictions I have just expressed, I have felt it my duty as an American Senator to review these treaty requirements, whatever the consequences to myself might be.

To-day the only forum in the world in which the provisions of this treaty can be freely and fearlessly discussed, the only body holding the fate of the world in its hands and upon whose decision rest consequences reaching to the remotest generation, is the Senate of the United States, endowed by the Constitution with the powers and responsibility of passing upon and approving all contracts with foreign governments. It is a duty, Mr. President, transcendently beyond partisanship and personal considerations, the importance of whose proper performance, in my judgment, is the supreme requirement of an American Senator. All these considerations have conspired to induce me to make this poor presentation in the hope that before the document shall be ratified the Members of this body and the American people may understand that it comprises the League of Nations not only, but covenants and conditions which affect the future, the commerce, the economic integrity, the social structure, and, perhaps, the peace of the world, through those economic provisions which, in defiance of our pre-armistice agreement, have been crystallized into the body of this treaty, and which recognize and enforce we must, however odious the task, once we shall have pronounced our judgment in its favor and thus given it the sanction of our final approval.

APPENDIX.

PRINCE MAXIMILIAN'S NOTE, OCTOBER 6, 1918.

The German Government requests the President of the United States to take in hand the restoration of peace. Acquaint all the belligerent States of the request and invite them to send plenipotentiaries for the purpose of opening negotiations. It accepts the program set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress on January 8, and in his later pronouncements, especially his speech of September 27, as a basis for peace negotiations. With a view to avoiding further bloodshed the German Government requests the immediate conclusion of an armistice on land and water and in the air.

REPLY OF UNITED STATES THROUGH CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES SWISS LEGATION.

OCTOBER 8.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge on behalf of the President your note of October 6 inclosing the communication from the German Government to the President, and I am instructed by the President to request you to make the following communication to the Imperial German Chancellor:

Before making reply to the request of the Imperial German Government, and in order that that reply shall be as candid and straightforward as the momentous interests involved require, the President of the United States deems it necessary to assure himself of the exact meaning of the note of the Imperial Chancellor. Does the Imperial Chancellor mean that the Imperial German Government accepts the terms laid down by the President in his address to the Congress of the United States on January last and subsequent addresses, and that its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon the practical details of their application?

The President feels bound to say with regard to the suggestion of an armistice that he would not feel at liberty to propose a cessation of arms to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated against the Central Powers so long as the armies of those powers are upon their soil. The good faith of any discussion would manifestly depend upon the consent of the Central Powers immediately to withdraw their forces everywhere from invaded territory. The President also feels that he is justified in asking whether the Imperial Chancellor is speaking merely for the constituted authorities of the Empire who have so far conducted the war. He deems the answer to these questions vital from every point of view.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

ROBERT LANSING.

GERMAN REPLY, OCTOBER 12.

In reply to the questions of the President of the United States of America the German Government hereby declares:

The German Government has accepted the terms laid down by President Wilson in his address of January 8 and in his subsequent addresses on the foundations of a permanent peace of justice. Consequently its object in entering into discussions would be only to agree upon practical details of the application of these terms. The German Government believes that the Governments of the powers associated with the Government of the United States also take the position taken by President Wilson in his address. The German Government in accordance with the Austro-Hungarian Government for the purpose of bringing about an armistice declares itself ready to comply with the propositions of the President in regard to evacuation.

The German Government suggests that the President may occasion the meeting of a mixed commission for making the necessary arrangements concerning the evacuation. The present German Government which has undertaken the responsibility for this step toward peace has been formed by conferences and in agreement with the great majority of the Reichstag. The chancellor, supported in all of his actions by the will of this majority, speaks in the name of the German Government and the German people.

SOLF,
State Secretary of Foreign Office.

LANSING TO OEDERLIN.

OCTOBER 14.

SIR: In reply to the communication of the German Government dated the 12th instant, which you handed me to-day, I have the honor to request you to transmit the following answer:

The unqualified acceptance by the present German Government and by a large majority of the German Reichstag of the terms laid down by the President of the United States of America in his address to the Congress of the United States on January 8, 1918, and in his subsequent addresses, justifies the President in making a frank and direct statement of his decision with regard to the communications of the German Government of October 8 and 12, 1918. It must be clearly understood that the process of evacuation and the conditions of an armistice are matters which must be left to the judgment and advice of the military advisers of the Government of the United States and the allied Governments, and the President feels it his duty to say that no arrangement can be accepted by the Government of the United States which does not provide absolutely satisfactory safeguards and guaranties of the maintenance of the present military supremacy of the Armies of the United States and of the Allies in the field. He feels confident that he can safely assume that this will also be the judgment and decision of the allied Governments.

The President feels that it is also his duty to add that neither the Government of the United States nor he is quite sure the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent will consent to consider an armistice so long as the armed forces of Germany continue the illegal and inhumane practices which they persist in. At the very time that the German Government approaches the Government of the United States with proposals of peace its submarines are engaged in sinking passenger ships at sea; and not the ships alone, but the very boats in which their passengers and crews seek to make their way to safety; and in their present enforced withdrawal from Flanders and France the German armies are pursuing a course of wanton destruction which has always been regarded as a direct violation of the rules and practices of civilized warfare. Cities and villages if not destroyed are being stripped of all they contain not only, but of their very inhabitants. The nations associated against Germany can not be expected to agree to a cessation of arms while acts of inhumanity, spoliation, and desolation are being continued, which they justly look upon with horror and with burning hearts.

It is necessary also, in order that there may be no possibility of misunderstanding that the President should very solemnly call the attention of the Government of Germany to the language and plain intent of one of the terms of peace which the German Government has now accepted. It is contained in the address of the President delivered at Mount Vernon on July 4 last. It is as follows:

"The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or, if it can not be presently destroyed, at least its reduction to virtual impotency."

The power which has hitherto controlled the German nation is of the sort here described. It is within the choice of the German nation to alter it. The President's words just quoted naturally constitute a condition precedent to peace, if peace is to come by the action of the German people themselves. The President feels bound to say that the whole process of peace will in his judgment depend upon the definiteness and the satisfactory character of the guarantees which can be given in this fundamental matter. It is indispensable that the governments associated against Germany should know beyond a peradventure with whom they are dealing. The President will make a separate reply to the Royal and Imperial Government of Austria-Hungary. Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

ROBERT LANSING.

GERMAN REPLY OCTOBER 20.

In accepting the proposal for an evacuation for occupied territories, the German Government has started from the assumption that the procedure of the evacuation and of the conditions of an armistice should be left to the judgment of the military advisers and that the actual standard of power on both sides in the field has to form the basis for arrangements safeguarding and guaranteeing this standard. The German Government suggests to the President that an opportunity should be brought about for fixing the details. It trusts that the President of the United States will approve of no demand which would be irreconcilable with the honor of the German people and with opening a way to a peace of justice.

The German Government protests against the reproach of illegal and inhumane actions made against the German land and sea forces and thereby against the German people. For the covering of a retreat destructions will always be necessary and they are carried out in so far as is permitted by international law. The German troops are under the most strict instruction to spare private property and to exercise care for the population to the best of their ability. Where transgressions occur in spite of these instructions the guilty are being punished. The German Government further denies that the German Navy in sinking ships has ever purposely destroyed lifeboats with their passengers. The German Government proposes with regard to all these charges that the facts be cleared up by neutral commissions.

In order to avoid anything that might hamper the work of peace the German Government has caused orders to be dispatched to all submarine commanders precluding the torpedoing of passenger ships, without, however, for technical reasons, being able to guarantee that these orders will reach every single submarine at sea before its return. As a fundamental condition for peace the President prescribes the destruction of every arbitrary power that can separately, secretly, and of its own single choice disturb the peace of the world. To this the German Government replies: Hitherto the representation of the people in the German Empire has not been endowed with an influence on the formation of the Government. The constitution did not provide for a concurrence of representation of the people in decisions of peace and war. These conditions have just now undergone a fundamental change. A new government has been formed in complete accordance with the principle of the representation of the people, based on equal, universal, secret, direct franchise.

The leaders of the great parties of the Reichstag are members of this Government. In the future no government can take or continue in office without possessing the confidence of a majority of the Reichstag. The responsibility of the Chancellor of the Empire to the representation of the people is being legally developed and safeguarded. The first act of the new Government has been to lay before the Reichstag a bill to alter the constitution of the Empire so that the consent of the representation of the people is required for decisions on war and peace. The permanence of the new system is, however, guaranteed not only by constitutional safeguards, but also by the unshakable determination of the German people, whose vast majority stands behind these reforms and demands their energetic continuance.

The question of the President, with whom he and the Governments associated against Germany are dealing, is therefore answered in a clear unequivocal manner by the statement that the offer of peace and an armistice has come from a Government which is free from any arbitrary and irresponsible influence and is supported by the approval of an overwhelming majority of the German people.

SOLF.

PRESIDENT'S REPLY OCTOBER 23 TO SWISS CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of October 22, transmitting a communication, under date of October 20, from the German Government and to advise you that the President has instructed me to reply thereto as follows:

Having received the solemn and explicit assurance of the German Government that it unreservedly accepts the terms of peace as laid down in his address to the Congress of the United States on January 8, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses, particularly the address of September 27, and that it desires to discuss the details of their application, and that this wish and purpose emanated not from those who have hitherto dictated German policy and conducted the present war on Germany's behalf, but from ministers who speak for a majority of the Reichstag and for an overwhelming majority of the German peoples, and having received also the explicit promises of the present German Government that the humane rules of civilized warfare will be observed both on land and sea by the German armed forces, the President of the United States feels that he can not decline to take up with the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated the question of an armistice.

He deems it his duty to say again, however, that the only armistice he would feel justified in submitting for consideration would be one which should leave the United States and the powers associated with her in a position to enforce any arrangements that may be entered into, and to make a renewal of hostilities on the part of Germany impossible. The President has therefore transmitted his correspondence with the present German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that if those Governments are disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated, their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such an armistice as will fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and assure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government has agreed, provided they deem such an armistice possible from the military point of view. Should such terms of armistice be suggested, their acceptance by Germany will afford the best concrete evidence of her unequivocal acceptance of the terms and principles of peace from which the whole action proceeds.

The President would deem himself lacking in candor did he not point out in the frankest possible terms the reason why extraordinary safeguards must be demanded. Significant and important as the constitutional changes seem to be which are spoken of by the German foreign secretary in his note of October 20, it does not appear that the principle of a Government responsible to the Germany people has yet been fully worked out, or that any guaranties either exist or are in contemplation that the alterations of principle and of practice, now partially agreed upon, will be permanent. Moreover, it does not appear that the heart of the present difficulty has been reached. It may be that future war has been brought under the control of the German people, but the present war has not been, and it is with the present war that we are dealing. It is evident that the German people have no means of commanding the acquiescence of the military authorities of the Empire in the popular will; that the power of the King of Prussia to control the policy of the Empire is unimpaired; that the determinating initiative still remains with those who have hitherto been the masters of Germany.

Feeling that the whole peace of the world depends now on plain speaking and straightforward action, the President deems it his duty to say, without any attempt to soften what may seem harsh words, that the nations of the world do not and can not trust the word of those who have hitherto been the masters of German policy, and to point out once more that in concluding peace and attempting to undo the infinite injuries and injustices of this war the Government of the United States can not deal with any but veritable representatives of the German people who have been assured of a genuine constitutional standing as the real rulers of Germany. If it must deal with the military masters and the monarchical autocrats of Germany now, or if it is likely to have to deal with them later in regard to the international obligations of the German Empire, it must demand not peace negotiations but surrender. Nothing can be gained by leaving this essential thing unsaid. Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

LANSING.

GERMANY, October 27.

The German Government has taken cognizance of the answer of the President of the United States. The President is aware of the far-reaching changes which have been carried out and are being carried out in the German constitutional structure, and that peace negotiations are being conducted by a people's government, in whose hands rests, both actually and constitutionally, the power to make the deciding conclusions. The military powers are also subject to it. The German Government now awaits proposals for an armistice which shall be the first step toward a just peace, as the President has described it in his proclamation.

SOLF.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Harrison	Moses	Smith, Md.
Borah	Henderson	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Hitchcock	New	Spencer
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sterling
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thomas
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Townsend
Dial	Kendrick	Phelan	Trammell
Dillingham	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	King	Pittman	Warren
Fletcher	Kirby	Pomerene	Watson
France	Knox	Ransdell	Williams
Gore	Lodge	Reed	Wolcott
Gronna	McCormick	Sheppard
Hale	McKellar	Shields

Mr. GRONNA. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I inquire how many Senators were found to be present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I only desire to say that last evening when we adjourned we were considering the amendment which I have proposed to reservation No. 1, proposed simply with a view of making it effective in its second clause, it now being in my judgment ineffective, and I think the purpose of it will be perfectly clear to anyone who examines it. I do not desire to take any further time in discussing it myself, unless objections are made to it, when I may have something to say.

Mr. BORAH. So far as this particular amendment is concerned, I have not any desire to delay. It seems to facilitate getting out of this thing, if we are ever to get in. Therefore I have no objection to voting on it, if both sides are ready to vote.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think there are Senators absent who would like to be here when a vote is taken upon any of the reservations offered; and if the Senator from Idaho desires to submit some remarks I am sure they would be very glad, because it would give all an opportunity to be present when we proceed to vote.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose it is really fair, of course, that there should be a full attendance when we do vote. I did not know but that the amendment was going to be accepted without any controversy. If there is going to be a vote, I suppose there should be a full attendance.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate for a short period only.

There was placed in the RECORD this morning an article by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, ex-president of Harvard University. In this article many statements appear which I assume the venerable professor intended to be derogatory of the Senate. Among other things he says:

> Again, a senseless apprehension and futile precautions against imaginary dangers are exhibited without shame by American Senators! What a humiliation for the country before the wondering world!

One might reply to Dr. Eliot in language similar to that in which he chose to express his views in this article. I think perhaps there is a better reply by stating a few facts, not upon my own authority, but upon the authority of those who are in much better position to know the facts than I.

Dr. Eliot contends that the objections which have been made to the treaty are purely imaginary; that they are made for the purpose of satisfying partisan feeling and personal antagonism, and are not based upon actual facts or conditions, or upon the real terms of the treaty or the covenant. Even while Dr. Eliot was writing his article the facts were fast transpiring which sustain all the contentions which have ever been made by those who are opposed to the treaty. He seems to have written his article several months ago, and perhaps only found an opportunity to publish it within the last few days, because the article has the appearance of writing upon the facts as they existed some five or six months ago, and is wholly a stranger to the facts as they exist at the present time. However, Dr. Eliot has never in all his writings disclosed any particular affection for facts. He is one of those voluminous contributors to the press who seem to think facts have no place in public discussions.

It has been contended by those who have advocated the league, particularly those outside of the Chamber, that those opposing the league have been uninformed, and have been acting from narrow partisan reasons. Day by day, however, those who are in a position to know the facts, who have studied the situation on the ground in Europe, who know the conditions as they exist there, are coming to sustain the view which has heretofore been advanced by the Senators who are now being so severely criticized by the doctor, I am going to call attention to statements from those who can not be charged with the motives which Prof. Eliot attributes to Senators, and who are in a much better position to know the facts than even those who have given study to the matter here on the floor.

A few days ago some one sent me this paper from Norway. It is an interview with the prime minister of Norway. It is rather an extended interview, and I am not going to insert it all in the RECORD—only a paragraph or so. He said, in regard to the Versailles treaty:

> I have not yet seen anything of peace. In my opinion the Vienna congress and the Holy Alliance was an innocent idyl as compared with the Versailles product.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have the impression that Norway has ratified the treaty. Can the Senator advise us as to that?

Mr. BORAH. I could not say; perhaps for the same reason that the Senate is being urged to ratify it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If that is the case, apparently the Norwegian Parliament does not concur with the prime minister.

Mr. BORAH. I am quoting the prime minister, not the Norwegian Parliament. He perhaps expressed his real view, and that Parliament may be, like other Parliaments, expressing somebody else's view.

I have here the views of another distinguished gentleman in Europe who has lately written on this subject. I presume most readers in this country are quite familiar with Dr. Dillon's writings. He has been a student of European affairs for 40 years, an instructor in some of the great European universities, was at the peace conference, and has written a number of books on subject matters which relate directly or indirectly to the affairs of Europe. He has now written a book upon the peace conference itself. I invite the attention of Dr. Eliot to this book. He will find in it a complete answer to practically all of the suggestions which he made in his article which was to-day published in the RECORD.

In the foreword Dr. Dillon said:

> The conference has transformed Europe into a seething mass of mutually hostile States powerless to face the economic competition of their overseas rivals and has left the very elements of society in flux.

Nothing has been said here which exceeds that as an indictment of the treaty. Yet it is stated by one who is now in Europe, who has lived there all his life, who has been a student of international affairs all his life, a man who has been and still is an advocate of a league of nations, who believes that a plan could be formulated by which peace could be reasonably permanently insured, and which could be successfully utilized for the purpose of settling disputes which might arise between the different nations of Europe. He is not, in other words, one of those persistently assailed characters who are known as irreconcilables. He is in favor of some kind of a league.

I read from page 384 of this book, which is something of a summing up of the entire situation:

> It is practices like these which ultimately determine the worth of the treaties and the covenant which Mr. Wilson was content to take back with him to Washington as the final outcome of what was to have been the most superb achievement of historic man. Of the new ethical principles, of the generous renunciation of privileges, of the righting of secular wrongs, of the respect that was to be shown for the weak, which were to have cemented the union of peoples into one pacific if not blissful family, there remained but the memory. No such bitter draught of disappointment was swallowed by the nations since the world first had a political history. Many of the resounding phrases that once foretokened a new era of peace, right, and equity were not merely emptied of their contents but made to connote their opposites. Freedom of the seas became supremacy of the seas, which may possibly turn out to be a blessed consummation for all concerned, but should not have been smuggled in under a gross misnomer. The abolition of war means, as British and American and French generals and admirals have since told their respective fellow citizens, thorough preparations for the next war, which are not to be confined, as heretofore, to the so-called military States, but are to extend over all Anglo-Saxondom. "Open covenants openly arrived at" signify secret conclaves and conspirative deliberations carried on in impenetrable secrecy which can not be dispensed with even after the whole business has passed into history. The self-determination of peoples finds its limit in the rights of every great power to hold its subject nationalities in thrall on the ground that their reciprocal relations appertain to the domestic policy of the State. It means, further, the privilege of those who wield superior force to put irresistible pressure upon those who are weak, and the lever which it places in their hands for the purpose is to be known under the attractive name of the protection of minorities. Abstention from interference in the home affairs of a neighboring community is made to cover intermeddling of the most irksome and humiliating character in matters which have no nexus with international law, for if they had the rule would be applicable to all nations. The lesser peoples must hearken to injunctions of the greater States respecting their mode of treating alien immigrants, and must submit to the control of foreign bodies which are ignorant of the situation and its requirements. Nor is it enough that those States should accord to the members of the Jewish and other races all the rights which their own citizens enjoy—they must go further and invest them with special privileges, and for this purpose renounce a portion of their sovereignty. They must likewise allow their more powerful allies to dictate to them their legislation on matters of transit and foreign commerce. For the great powers, however, this law of minorities was not written. They are above the law. Their warrant is force. In a word, force is the trump card in the political game of the future as it was in that of the past. And M. Clemenceau's reminder to the petty States at the opening of the conference, that the wielders of 12,000,000 troops are the masters of the situation, was appropriate. Thus the war which was provoked by the transformation of a solemn treaty into a scrap of paper was concluded by the presentation of two scraps of paper as a treaty and a covenant for the moral renovation of the world.

At page 436, Dr. Dillon, in the concluding paragraph of his book, says:

Whatever the tests one applies to the work of the conference—ethical, social, or political—they reveal it as a factor eminently calculated to sap high interests, to weaken the moral nerve of the present generation, to fan the flames of national and racial hatred, to dig an abyss between the classes and the masses, and to throw open the sluice gates to the inrush of the waves of anarchist nationalities. Truth, justice, equity, and liberty have been twisted and pressed into the service of economico-political boards. In the United States the people who prided themselves on their aloofness are already fighting over European interests. In Europe every nation's hand is raised against its neighbor's and every people's hand against its ruling class. Every Government is making its policy subservient to the needs of the future war which is universally looked upon as an unavoidable outcome of the Versailles peace. Imperialism and militarism are striking roots in soil where they were hitherto unknown.

In a word, Prussianism, instead of being destroyed, has been openly adopted by its ostensible enemies, and the huge sacrifices offered up by the heroic armies of the foremost nations are being misused to give one-half of the world just cause to rise up against the other half.

Mr. President, if those paragraphs stood alone they might be regarded as merely the conclusions of one man, and therefore not of great weight, although they would have to be considered as the conclusions of a man peculiarly fitted to judge, but these conclusions are supported by some 400 pages of argumentative facts. While the Keynes book has been an exceedingly interesting and, to my mind, a very instructive and a very wonderful book, I think one may conclude that Dr. Dillon has traveled over a much larger territory, has exhibited a much wider knowledge of facts, and has presented an equally conclusive argument against the treaty itself.

I do not care how thoroughly a man has been committed to the idea that the treaty would bring peace, particularly as it is connected with the covenant, I venture to say that when he reads the facts as recorded in this volume, not the conclusions but the facts which support the conclusions, his faith will be greatly shaken. If such men as Dr. Eliot can find time to separate themselves from the fads and predilections of the past and conditions which they supposed to exist and which never did exist, to inquire into the real facts as they exist to-day, they will at least refrain from denouncing those who hold a different view. I recognize the right of any man to hold a different opinion than my own concerning this great question, but when men are denounced as insincere, as moved by mere partisan feeling and personal prejudice, it is not inappropriate to call attention to the fact that such statements are generally made by those who have no real information with which to entertain the public. At a time when the most independent and best-informed minds of Europe are revealing to the world an array of facts and conditions which condemn the whole treaty, which seem conclusively to show that unless the treaty is wholly and radically changed, and unless the league is built upon democratic instead of autocratic principles disaster must follow, Dr. Eliot and his kindred spirits indulge in querulous diatribes, and reiterate arguments long since refuted by current events.

These advocates of the league, ignoring the things which are happening as a result of the treaty, ignoring conditions indescribable, of famine and chaos superinduced by the treaty, continue to fondle theories long ago exploded by actual facts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator speaks of many facts set forth by the author of that book. Do they relate to the League of Nations or to the terms of the treaty with Germany?

Mr. BORAH. They relate to both.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator give an illustration as to how the facts may affect the League of Nations?

Mr. BORAH. I am not sure that I can turn to it hastily, but I rather think I can find it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rather assume from what the Senator has read that the injustices, animosities, and disturbed conditions in Europe to which he refers have nothing to do with the League of Nations but relate only to the terms of the treaty with Germany.

Mr. BORAH. The argument of the author has largely to do with the treaty. The Senator is correct in that proposition; but as the Senator goes through the book, and, I think, before I get through reading it, he will find that the author is of the opinion that the covenant itself is, first, wholly inadequate to remedy the situation, and, secondly, that it is based upon a wrong principle. For instance, he contends that the covenant utterly fails to provide for disarmament. He contends, secondly, that the whole theory of the covenant is that of force based upon the military power of the five great nations of the earth, that it is designed to hold 900,000,000 people in subjection to the dictation of some 300,000,000 people. You will find that interwoven through the book, because it does not hesitate to deal with the entire situation; in fact, he denounces most directly and vividly the interweaving of the two propositions together. He says that the treaty is founded upon vengeance, upon punishment; that the league is supposed to be founded upon the very opposite principle of arbitration and of equity and justice; and that, therefore, the two propositions are in direct conflict and irreconcilable, and that they should never have been associated together.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I take it from the question of the Senator from Nebraska that he is of the opinion that this author's criticism is irrelevant because it is aimed at the peace treaty proper, and that, therefore, it can have no connection with the League of Nations.

I should like to call attention to the fact that on March 4, 1919, when the President started to return to Europe, he announced to the country that he proposed to go to Europe and bring back a League of Nations, and that Senators would find the league so interwoven with the peace treaty that they could not dissect the one from the other. If that is the case, then the treaty and the league being inextricably mixed and mingled together, the vice of one is necessarily the vice of the other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Idaho tolerate another interruption?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that what the Senator from Missouri says is true, but I understood that the Senator from Idaho was seeking to confound Dr. Eliot of Harvard by citing something by this author concerning conditions in Europe, and I was drawing attention to the fact that those conditions were not produced by the league which Dr. Eliot was discussing, but were produced, if at all, by the terms of the other parts of the treaty which Dr. Eliot was not discussing.

Mr. REED. And which the league is to enforce, and in the enforcement of which it is to become an active instrumentality.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on page 409 Dr. Dillon says:

Such a system may be wise and conducive to the highest aims, but it can hardly be termed "democratic." The military powers who command 12,000,000 soldiers will possess a majority in the council. The secretariat alone will be permanent, and will naturally be appointed by the great powers.

Instead of abolishing war, the conference described its abolition as beyond the power of man to compass. Disarmament, which was to have been one of its main achievements, is eliminated from the covenant. As the war that was to have been the last will admittedly be followed by others, the delegates of the great powers worked conscientiously, as behooved patriotic statesmen, to obtain in advance all possible advantages for their respective countries by way of preparing for it. The new order, which in theory reposes upon right, justice, and moral fellowship, in reality depends upon powerful armies and navies. France must remain under arms, seeing that she has to keep watch on the Rhine. Britain and the United States are to go on building warships and aircraft, besides training their youth for the coming Armageddon. The article of the covenant which lays it down that "the members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety," is, to use a Russian simile, written on water with a fork. Britain, France, and the United States are already agreed that they will combine—to repel unprovoked aggression on the part of Germany. That evidently signifies that they will hold themselves in readiness to fight, and will therefore make due preparation. This arrangement is a substitute for a supernational army, as though prevention were not better than cure; that it will prove efficacious in the long run very few believe.

Referring to the special alliance—

One clear-visioned Frenchman writes: "The inefficacy of the organization aimed at by the conference constrains France to live in continual and increasing insecurity, owing to the falling off of her population." He adds: "It follows from this abortive expedient—if it is to remain definitive—that each member State must protect itself or come to terms with the more powerful ones, as in the past. Consequently, we are in presence of the maintenance of militarism and the régime of armament." This writer goes further and accuses Mr. Wilson of having played into the hands of Britain. "President Wilson," he affirms, "has more or less sacrificed to the English Government the society of nations and the question of armaments, that of the colonies, and that of the freedom of the seas." This, however, is an overstatement. It was not for the sake of Britain that the American statesmen gave up so much; it was for the sake of saving something of the covenant. It was in the spirit of Sir Boyle Roche, whose attachment to the British constitution was such that to save a part of it he was willing to sacrifice the whole.

The arbitration of disputes is provided for by one of the articles of the covenant; but the parties may go to war three months later with a clear conscience and an appeal to right, justice, self-determination, and the usual abstract nouns.

On page 421 he says:

By debarring the masses from participation in a grandiose scheme, the success of which depends upon their assent, the Governments are indirectly but surely encouraging secret combined opposition, and in some cases Bolshevism. The masses resent being treated as children after having been appealed to as arbiters and rescuers. For four and a half years it was they who bore the brunt of the war, they who sacrificed their sons and their substance. In the future it is they to whom the States look for the further sacrifices in blood and treasure which will be necessary in the struggles which they evidently anticipate. Well, some of them refuse these sacrifices in advance. They challenge the right of the Governments to retain the power of making war and peace. That power they are working to get into their own hands and to wield in their own way, or at any rate to have a say in its exercise. And in order to secure it some sections of the peoples are making common cause with the Socialist revolutionaries, while others have gone the length of Bolshevism. And that is a serious danger. The agitation now going on among the people, therefore, starts with a grievance. The masses have many other grievances besides the one just sketched—the survivals of the feudal age, the privileges of class, the inequality of opportunity.

On page 413 the author declares:

On the Monroe doctrine, in connection with the League of Nations, the less said the soonest mended. But one can not well say less than this: That any real society of peoples such as Mr. Wilson first conceived and advocated is as incompatible with "regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine" as are the maintenance of national armaments and the bartering of populations. It is immaterial whether one concludes that a society of nations is therefore impossible in the present conjuncture or that all those survivals of the old State system are obsolescent and should be abolished. The two are unquestionably irreconcilable.

Then he quotes the late Secretary of State, as follows:

I consider the League of Nations at present as entirely useless. The great powers have simply gone ahead and arranged the world to suit themselves. England and France, in particular, have gotten out of the treaty everything they wanted. The League of Nations can do nothing to alter any unjust clauses of the treaty except by the unanimous consent of the league members. The great powers will never consent to changes in the interests of weaker peoples.

In view of things lately transpiring, I think it unnecessary to comment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is that attributed to Secretary Lansing?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it is attributed to Secretary Lansing and he gives his authority in a footnote. I think the Senator will find that to be correct. Interesting, is it not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the date of the publication of the volume from which the Senator from Idaho is reading?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Connecticut asks the date of the publication of the book. The date of the publication does not appear, but it has just been printed; it has just come into the book stores. The title of the book is "The Peace Conference." It has a vast amount of information which seems to be in the possession of everyone except the Senate of the United States. If the Senate will indulge me, I want to read a rather extended discussion of the question of religious equality and racial equality.

The center of interest during the drafting of the covenant lay in the clause claiming the equality of religions, which Mr. Wilson was bent on having passed at all costs, if not in one form then in another. This is one example of the occasional visibility of the religious thread which ran through a good deal of his personal work at the conference. For it is a fact—not yet realized even by the delegates themselves—that distinctly religious motives inspired much that was done by the conference on what seemed political or social grounds. The strategy by the eminent American statesman to have his stipulation accepted proceeded in this case on the lines of a humanitarian resolve to put an end to sanguinary wars, rather than on those which the average reformer, bent on Kultural progress, would have traced. Actuality was imparted to this simple and yet thorny topic by a concrete proposal which the President made one day. What he is reported to have said is briefly this: "As the treatment of religious confessions has been in the past, and may again in the future be, a cause of sanguinary wars, it seems desirable that a clause should be introduced into the covenant establishing absolute liberty for creeds and confessions." On what, Mr. President," asked the first Polish delegate, "do you found your assertion that wars are still brought about by the differential treatment meted out to religions? Does contemporary history bear out this statement? And, if not, what likelihood is there that religious inequality will precipitate sanguinary conflicts in the future?" To this pointed question Mr. Wilson is said to have made the characteristic reply that he considered it expedient to assume this nexus between religious inequality and war as the safest way of bringing the matter forward. If he were to proceed on any other lines, he added, there would be truth and force in the objection which would doubtless be raised that the conference was intruding upon the domestic affairs of sovereign States. As that charge would damage the cause, it must be rebutted in advance. And for this purpose he deemed it prudent to approach the subject from the side he had chosen.

This reply was listened to in silence and unfavorably commented upon later. The alleged relation between such religious inequality as has survived into the twentieth century and such wars as are waged nowadays is so obviously fictitious that one can hardly understand the line of reasoning that led to its assumption or the effect which the fiction could be supposed to have on the minds of those legislators who might be opposed to the measure on the ground that it involved undue interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States. The motion was referred to a commission, which in due time presented a report. Mr. Wilson was absent when the report came up for discussion, his place being taken by Col. House. The atmosphere was chilly, only a couple of the delegates being disposed to support the clause—Roumania's representative, M. Diamandi, was one, and another was Baron Makino, whose help Col. House would gladly have dispensed with, so inacceptable was the condition it carried with it. Baron Makino said that he entirely agreed with Col. House and the American delegates. The equality of religious confessions was not merely desirable, but necessary to the smooth working of a society of nations such as they were engaged in establishing. He held, however, that it should be extended to races, that extension being also a corollary of the principle underlying the new international ordering. He would therefore move the insertion of a clause proclaiming the equality of races and religions. At this Col. House looked pensive. Nearly all the other opinions were hostile to Col. House's motion.

The reasons alleged by each of the dissenting lawgivers were interesting. Lord Robert Cecil surprised many of his colleagues by informing them that in England the Catholics who are fairly treated as things are, could not possibly be set on a footing of perfect equality with their Protestant fellow citizens, because the constitution forbids it. Nor could the British people be asked to alter their constitution. He gave as instances of the slight inequality at present enforced the circumstance that no Catholic can ascend the throne as monarch nor sit on the wool sack as lord chancellor in the upper house.

M. Larnaude, speaking in the name of France, stated that his country had passed through a sequence of embarrassments caused by legislation on the relations between the Catholics and the State, and that the introduction of a clause enacting perfect equality might revive controversies which were happily losing their sharpness. He considered it, therefore, inadvisable to settle this delicate matter by inserting the proposed declaration in the covenant. Belgium's first delegate, M. Hymans, pointed out that the objection taken by his Government was of a different but equally cogent character. There was reason to apprehend that the Flemings might avail themselves of the equality clause to raise awkward issues and to sow seeds of dissension. On those grounds he would like to see the proposal waived. Signor Orlando, half seriously, half jokingly, reminded his colleagues that none of their countries had, like his, a Pope in their capital. The Italian Government must therefore proceed in religious matters with the greatest circumspection, and could not lightly assent to any measure capable of being manipulated to the detriment of the public interest. Hence, he was unable to give the motion his support. It was finally suggested that both proposals be withdrawn. To this Col. House demurred, on the ground that President Wilson, who was unavoidably absent, attached very great weight to the declaration—

We must have great respect for the discretion of Col. House, in view of things which have happened here lately—to which he hoped the delegates would give their most favorable consideration. One of the members then rose and said: "In that case, we had better postpone the voting until Mr. Wilson can attend." The suggestion was adopted. When the matter came up for discussion at a subsequent sitting, the Japanese substituted "nations" for "races."

In the meantime the usual arts of parliamentary emergency were practiced outside the conference to induce the Japanese to withdraw their proposal altogether. They were told that to accept or refuse it would be to damage the cause of the future league without furthering their own. But the Marquis Saionji and Baron Makino refused to yield an inch of their ground.

A conversation then took place between the premier of Australia, on the one side, and Baron Makino and Viscount Chinda, on the other, with a view to their reaching a compromise. For Mr. Hughes was understood to be the leader of those who opposed any declaration of racial equality. The Japanese statesmen showed him their amendment and asked him whether he could suggest any modifications that would satisfy himself and them. The answer was in the negative. To the argument of the Japanese delegates the Australian premier is understood to have replied: "I am willing to admit the equality of the Japanese as a nation, and also as individuals man to man. But I do not admit the consequence that we would throw open our country to them. It is not that we hold them to be inferior to ourselves, but simply that we do not want them. Economically they are a perturbing factor, because they accept wages much below the minimum for which our people are willing to work. Neither do they blend well with our people. Hence we do not want them to marry our women. Those are my reasons. We mean no offense.

"Our restrictive legislation is not aimed specially at the Japanese. British subjects in India are affected by it in exactly the same way. It is impossible that we should formulate any modification of your amendment, because there is no modification conceivable that would satisfy us both."

The Japanese delegates were understood to say that they would maintain their motion, and that unless it passed they would not sign the document. Mr. Hughes reported that if it should pass he would refuse to sign it. Finally the Australian premier asked Baron Makino whether he would be satisfied with the following qualifying proviso: "This affirmation of the principle of equality is not to be applied to immigration or nationalization." Baron Makino and Viscount Chinda both answered in the negative and withdrew.

The final act is described by eyewitnesses as follows: Congruously with the order of the day, President Wilson having moved that the city of Geneva be selected as the capital of the future league, obtained a majority, whereupon he announced that the motion had passed.

Then came the burning question of the equality of nations. The Polish delegate arose and opposed on the formal ground that nothing ought to be inserted in the preamble which was not dealt with also in the body of the covenant, as otherwise it would be no more than an isolated theory devoid of organic connection with the whole. The Japanese delegates delivered speeches of cogent argument and impressive debating power. Baron Makino made out a very strong case for the equality of nations. Viscount Chinda followed in a trenchant discourse, which was highly appreciated by his hearers, nearly all of whom recognized the justice of the Japanese claim. The Japanese delegates refused to be dazzled by the circumstance that Japan was to be represented on the executive council as one of the five great powers, and that the rejection of the proposed amendment could not therefore be construed as a diminution of her prestige. This consideration, they retorted, was wholly irrelevant to the question whether or not the nations were to be recognized as equal. They ended by refusing to withdraw their modified amendment and calling for a vote. The result was a majority for the amendment. Mr. Wilson thereupon announced that a majority was insufficient to justify its adoption, and that nothing less than absolute unanimity could be regarded as adequate. At this a delegate objected: "Mr. Wilson, you have just accepted a majority for your own motion respecting Geneva; on what grounds, may I ask, do you refuse to abide by a majority vote on the amendment of the Japanese delegation?" "The two cases are different," was the reply. "On the subject of the seat of the league unanimity is unattainable." This closed the official discussion.

Some time later, it is asserted, the Roumanians, who had supported Mr. Wilson's motion on religious equality, were approached on the subject, and informed that it would be agreeable to the American delegates to have the original proposal brought up once more. Such a motion, it was added, would come with especial propriety from the Roumanians, who, in the person of M. Diamandi, had advocated it from the outset.

But the Roumanian delegates hesitated, pleading the invincible opposition of the Japanese. They were assured, however, that the Japanese would no longer discountenance it. Thereupon they broached the matter to Lord Robert Cecil, but he, with his wonted caution, replied that it was a delicate subject to handle, especially after the experience they had already had. As for himself, he would rather leave the initiative to others. Could the Roumanian delegates not open their minds to Col. House, who took the amendment so much to heart? They acted on this suggestion and called on Col. House. He, too, however, declared that it was a momentous as well as a thorny topic and for that reason had best be referred to the head of the American delegation. President Wilson, having originated the amendment, was the person most qualified to take direct action. It is further affirmed that they sounded the President as to the advisability of mooting the question anew, but that he declined to face another vote, and the matter was dropped for good—in that form.

It was publicly asserted later on that the Japanese decided to abide by the rejection of their amendment and to sign the covenant as the result of a bargain on the Shantung dispute.

It is proper to say this conclusion is not fully accepted by the author.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator if he knows where the information came from as to the inner workings of the peace conference which this author is setting out? Is that part of the procès verbal that has been denied to the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. The author states here that it was by an eyewitness, but he does not name the witness.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from California, if the Senator from Missouri is through.

Mr. REED. I merely wanted to know whether the Senator from Idaho was aware of the source of the information.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am in possession of that information, but I do not at the moment recall the source of it. I am advised that by reason of the attitude of the President and of the American representatives at the conference the request of the Japanese for favorable expression of racial equality was defeated. Do I understand from the reading of the Senator from Idaho that that is also his conclusion?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it was defeated, although it carried by a majority vote.

Mr. PHELAN. Is the Senator disposed to believe that the American representatives opposed the resolution? The Senator does not reveal the vote by nations.

Mr. BORAH. No; the author does not. He simply says that the motion carried by a majority vote, but he does not state how they voted.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator will recall that I asked him at the time this question was being discussed in Paris to join with me in a telegram on behalf of the Western States urging the American representatives to vote against the resolution, and I understand that the Senator from Idaho complied with that request and sent a telegram at that time. Is not that true?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and I also sent one to the Senator. I replied to the Senator, stating what I would do.

Mr. PHELAN. I am well aware that I received a telegram from the Senator, but that is neither here nor there at this moment. The Senator is satisfied, however, from his reading of this history of the transaction that the American representatives responded to our request favorably?

Mr. BORAH. No; Mr. President, I do not know that they did and I do not know that they did not. I would think the Senator's telegram would have a great influence with them. I did not assume that mine would.

Mr. PHELAN. I shall endeavor to lay before the Senate tomorrow some information I have on this subject.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether they voted against it, and this book does not undertake to say. If the Senator has any information which satisfies him, I assume it will satisfy me.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I can contribute this circumstance to the discussion: In a magazine called "Asia," which is published, I think, in New York, and devoted to Far Eastern interests, there is a communication from the pen of a newspaper correspondent who attended the conference at Versailles, Mr. Gallagher, a very reliable man, as I am informed, who says that the adverse vote—that is, the vote against the Japanese resolution—was that cast by President Wilson and Lloyd-George.

Mr. BORAH. I presume that is true from the ruling which the President made with reference to requiring unanimity. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to contribute this item to the discussion of a question that ought not to be in doubt and would not be in doubt if the proceedings of the peace conference had been laid before the Senate and had not been withheld. I read now from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which contains an article from the Washington Post of April 20, 1919:

In an astonishingly frank interview Baron Goto declared that Japan considered herself the spokesman of all oriental peoples, and, having already obtained the support of President Wilson, would not give up her fight for racial equality.

"Both President Wilson and Col. House voted with Japan for racial equality at the peace conference," Goto said.

I do not know whether that newspaper statement is correct, but it was put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as long ago as September 22 and has remained up to this day, so far as I know, without official denial. I do not stand sponsor for the statement now, because I do not know, but is it not manifest to Senators that we ought to have the minutes of the proceedings of the peace conference laid before us, to the end that we may act in the light of the facts as developed by those minutes and not be left to haphazard statements and to guesswork?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from what journal he read and by whom the article is signed?

Mr. REED. The quotation in the RECORD is from the Washington Post of April 20, 1919.

Mr. PHELAN. And who inserted it in the RECORD?

Mr. REED. I will answer the Senator in a moment. [A pause.] I believe I inserted it in the RECORD myself. I had not noticed that, but I hope that will not detract from the authenticity of the article in the Senator's opinion. [Laugher in the galleries.] At least I hope——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. Demonstrations are not permitted in the galleries, and if repeated the Chair will instruct the Doorkeeper to clear the galleries.

Mr. REED. At least I hope it will not entirely destroy the reputation of the Washington Post for truth and veracity.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it seems from the remarks of the Senator from Idaho and from his various citations that the American representatives, including the President and Col. House, opposed the resolution of the Japanese for racial equality. I think the weight of the evidence which has been laid before us just now bears out that conclusion. The Senator from Missouri sees fit on top of that to introduce an unsigned article from the Washington Post of an ancient date. Of course, I do not reflect upon the Washington Post or upon the Senator from Missouri when I say that the Senate has evidently been imposed upon. The Senator from Missouri accepts his version, because he says that to date it has not been denied; but must the President and the peace conference take cognizance of everything that is published in the Washington Post? I was present——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. One moment. I was present in the Senate long before I was a Member, when a Senator from California, Hon. Stephen M. White, was rebuked by John Sherman. John Sherman said:

You are a new Member of this body, and you have introduced a document which, upon investigation, I find is not authentic. I warn you that the Senate of the United States is a dignified body and that it is not accustomed to being imposed upon, nor will it brook such conduct in the future.

The old gentleman, the dean of the Senate, then sat down, and I am sure the Senator, new to this body, learned a lesson which would be very valuable to us in these days, when almost everything, as the Vice President knows, is introduced into the RECORD without verification. I therefore resent the submission, in contradiction to what the learned Senator from Idaho has said, of a newspaper clipping to prove that the Senator from Idaho is probably in error. I am convinced, from documents I have, that the version given by the Senator from Idaho is the correct version, and I trust that it will stand upon the record of the Senate as demonstrating to us the loyalty which our representatives showed in a matter which is of vital importance to the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. REED. I really regret that I was not in the Senate to hear this lecture, delivered by an ancient Senator to a modern Senator who happened to come in, so that I might have drunk from the same fountain of wisdom that has so long inspired the Senator from California.

If we do not have the evidence in the case at first hand, who is to blame? Who suppressed the evidence? The Foreign Relations Committee asked for the procès verbal. It was refused by the President. The legal inference arising from the suppression of a fact is well known. It is that the fact would injure if made known. In addition to that, when the President invited the Foreign Relations Committee to appear before him, he was interrogated directly with regard to this matter. From the testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, on August 20, I read a quotation.

The President referred to the fact that the Japanese had presented a resolution for racial equality, but rather as an expression of opinion or hope, and it was not pressed for action:

Senator JOHNSON of California. May I ask, if permissible, how the representatives of the United States voted upon that particular proposition?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, I think it is very natural you should ask that. I am not sure that I am at liberty to answer, because that touches the intimacy of a great many controversies that occurred in that conference, and I think it is best, in the interest of international good understanding, that I should not answer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to remind the Senator from Missouri, while he is discussing these matters, of a circumstance which I am sure he will recall. At the very outset of the proceedings of the peace conference at Versailles the question came up as to what degree of publicity should be given to the proceedings there. It was universally stated in the papers at the time, and I have no doubt in accordance with the fact, that the President of the United States had voted to give the widest publicity to what was transpiring and that he had been outvoted by the other members.

Mr. REED. I am afraid the Senator from Montana has just violated the rule laid down by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] by quoting newspaper accounts, and is liable to a lecture the same as I received.

Now, Mr. President, I agree with this proposition: We were all given to understand that the President was going over there to conduct these negotiations openly. It was to be "open covenants, openly arrived at." The first great disappointment we met with was that they were secret covenants, secretly arrived at, behind locked doors. We were then told that after the agreements had been made the public would be taken into confidence and the whole world would be advised of what had taken place, but that has never yet transpired. That hope died like so many other hopes.

Now, that leaves the Senate in this sort of situation: It asked for the records. They were refused. The President has been asked to speak and has declined. We have nothing left, then, to go to except newspaper statements or the statements of men who have some inside source of information. It is almost inconceivable to me that the Washington Post would print an absolute and unqualified statement that a great Japanese statesman in the city of New York had made a statement which he did not make, and print that statement when he was in the city of New York, where he could deny it, and would undoubtedly deny it, if it were untrue.

The statement I have read did not appear alone in the Washington Post, but, as my recollection goes, it was published broadcast throughout the country, having been sent out over the wires generally, and I have never heard it denied to this moment.

I do not know whether the Senator from Idaho has faith in the view that the Senator from California states, namely, that the author of this work leans to the opinion that the President of the United States voted against the Japanese proposal of racial equality. I do not so understand him, but I possibly misunderstood him.

Mr. BORAH. The author does not assume to state how the President and the American delegates voted. I drew my inference from the proposition that the President declared that in order to carry it out it had to be unanimous. Whereas he had a short time before ruled that a majority could carry as to the capital, he held that it had to be unanimous so far as this question of racial equality was concerned. I naturally infer that the President was not in favor of racial equality, but the author does not say it. I am drawing my inference now from the author, leaving outside these facts which have been adduced by Senators on the other side.

Mr. PHELAN. But the Senator mentioned the President and Col. House by name as having voted against the resolution. Was he not quoting the author?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; I did not say that they had voted against it.

Mr. PHELAN. I think the Senator mentioned their names in that connection. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. BORAH. I will look at the page, so that I will not make any mistake about it.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, of course, the inference is direct that if the Japanese objected to the ruling of the President in favor of unanimity on one vote and against unanimity on the other, they were resenting the vote which he had cast.

Mr. BORAH. That was the inference which I drew, but the author does not assume to state how the President or anyone else voted. He does state, however, that the President ruled that the vote had to be a unanimous vote, and from that I drew the inference which I stated to the Senator from California.

Mr. President, we have been discussing this question of secrecy, and I think it time to refer to a paragraph or two in regard to that, and then I will dismiss the subject for this evening, with the hope that all the ex-Presidents will read this book and get acquainted with the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there are some of us who do not know much about the author. Could the Senator from Idaho, just in a word, tell us who the author is, besides his name?

Mr. BORAH. I stated in the beginning——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator has mentioned the fact that he had lived in Europe and was a distinguished writer. To what nationality does he belong?

Mr. BORAH. I understand that he is an English-born citizen. He has spent a great deal of time in Russia. He lived in Russia for years, and was connected with a university there, and has since traveled about Europe, corresponding for journals all over the world. He has written a number of books, such as the Russian Collapse, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He is an Englishman?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I so understand. I know nothing about him except what I have gathered from reading his articles.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, he is and has been for years an acknowledged authority on Russian facts.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, possibly I can shed some light on the subject from personal acquaintance with Dr. Dillon. He is the son of an Irish father and a French mother; was educated in various universities in Europe; for a time held the chair in Russia in the University of Kharkov; was for many years the Petrograd and Russian correspondent of the London Telegraph, and was the near eastern correspondent for that journal. He has traveled widely all over the world. He has been in this country many times, his longest sojourn being at the time of the Portsmouth peace conference. He has contributed to the Nineteenth Century and the Fortnightly Review, and has been known as an authority on Russian, near eastern, and European affairs for more than 20 years.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator.

Referring to the question of secrecy, and before I read from the author, allow me to say that I have never undertaken to find out who was responsible for the secrecy at Versailles; and, so far as my view of the situation is concerned, it really does not concern me as to who was responsible. I only know that there was the utmost secrecy. Now, one of two things happened. Either the President consented to the secrecy and was a party to depriving the American people of the facts, or else the European delegates controlled the American delegation in regard to the matter; and, so far as the American people are concerned, the injury is just as great in one instance as in the other. It does not make any difference what particular individual or individuals was or were responsible for it. Just as soon as we crossed the ocean and began to do business with the European diplomats, instead of Americanizing the Europeans, the Europeans Europeanized us; and that is precisely what will happen when we join the league.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the proces verbaux, which are the minutes of these proceedings, had been exhibited to the committee of the French Senate or House, I have forgotten which, they were about to be exhibited to the entire House; and I asked the late Secretary Lansing, when he appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations, why they had not been exhibited, and he said it was because the President had cabled, through the State Department, to M. Clemenceau stating that he wanted them kept secret and did not want them shown.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Dr. Dillon, who was at Versailles, speaking of the question of censorship and secrecy, says:

> Never was political veracity in Europe at a lower ebb than during the peace conference. The blinding dust of half truths cunningly mixed with falsehood and deliberately scattered with a lavish hand obscured the vision of the people, who were expected to adopt or acquiesce in the judgments of their rulers on the various questions that arose.
>
> If the falsehoods circulated and the true facts suppressed were to be collected and published in a volume, one would realize the depths to which the standard of intellectual and moral integrity was lowered.
>
> The censorship was retained by the great powers during the conference as a sort of soft cushion on which the self-constituted dispensers of fate comfortably reposed. In Paris, where it was particularly severe and unreasonable, it protected the secret conclave from the harsh strictures of the outside world, concealing from the public not only the incongruities of the conference, but also many of the warnings of contemporary history. In the opinion of unbiased Frenchmen no such rigorous, systematic, and shortsighted repression of press liberty had been known since the Third Empire as was kept up under the rule of the great tribune whose public career had been one continuous campaign against every form of coercion. This twofold policy of secrecy on the part of the delegates and censorship on the part of the authorities proved incongruous as well as dangerous. * * *

Now, Senators, here is a statement of fact:

> It was characteristic of the system that two American citizens were employed to read the cablegrams arriving from the United States to French newspapers. The object was the suppression of such messages as tended to throw doubt on the useful belief that the people of the great American Republic were solid behind their President, ready to approve his decisions and acts, and that his cherished covenant, sure of ratification, would serve as a safe guaranty to all the States which the application of his various principles might leave strategically exposed. In this way many interesting items of intelligence from the United States were kept out of the newspapers, while others were mutilated, and almost all were delayed. Protests were unavailing.

Now, Mr. President, this is what happened at Versailles. They had two Americans who read the news from America and eliminated from the French press that which they did not desire; they had two or more Frenchmen who eliminated the news that they did not wish to come to America; so that the facts were kept from the people upon the Western and upon the Eastern Hemispheres.

As I said a moment ago, I do not care who is responsible for it. I know that there sat a body dealing with a stupendous affair of more concern to the people at large than any other transaction which has taken place in a century, and there was a systematic, well-organized, and effectual scheme to keep from the people on both continents the facts in regard to it. No more secretive body ever convened. The conspirators at Vienna were not so secretive nor so determined that the facts should never be known to the people at large.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me to read an observation made upon that point by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who does not appear to be in the Chamber at this moment? It was made on the 11th of November, 1919, in the Senate Chamber in an interruption when I was talking on the treaty. I was speaking then of the secrecy of the Versailles conference, and the Senator from Pennsylvania said:

> Mr. KNOX. Did the Senator from Nebraska notice in yesterday's publications that Clemenceau's principal secretary in a public speech in Bordeaux had stated that the reason why the sessions were held in secret was because the President of the United States insisted upon it as against his own judgment?

Mr. LODGE. "His own judgment," meaning Clemenceau's?

Mr. NORRIS. The words "his own judgment" refer, of course, to Clemenceau.

Mr. BORAH. I remember that. I read from page 102:

> Publicity was none the less strongly advocated by the plenipotentiaries in their speeches and writings. These were as signposts pointing to roads along which they themselves were incapable of moving. By their own accounts they were inveterate enemies of secrecy and censorship. * * *
>
> During the fateful days of the conference preventive censorship was practiced with a degree of rigor equaled only by its senselessness. As late as the month of June the columns of the newspapers were checkered with blank spaces. "Scarcely a newspaper in Paris appears uncensored at present," one press organ wrote. "Some papers protest, but protests are vain." "Practically not a word as to the nature of the peace terms that France regards as most vital to her existence appears in the French papers this morning," complained a journal at the time when even the Germans were fully informed of what was being enacted. On one occasion Bonsoir was seized for expressing the view that the treaty embodied an Anglo-Saxon peace; on another, for reproducing an interview with Marshal Foch that had already appeared in a widely circulated Paris newspaper. By way of justifying another of these seizures the French censor alleged that an article in the paper was deemed uncomplimentary to Mr. Lloyd-George.
> The editor replied in a letter to the British Premier affirming that there was nothing in the article but what Mr. George could and should be proud of. In fact, it only commended him "for having served the interests of his country most admirably and having precedence given to them over all others."

But that was the thing that Mr. George did not want known at that particular time.

> The letter concluded: "We are apprehensive that in the whole business there is but one thing truly uncomplimentary, and that is that the French censorship, for the purpose of strangling the French press, should employ your name, the name of him who abolished censorship many weeks ago."
> Every conceivable precaution was taken against the leakage of information respecting what was going on in the council of ten. Notwithstanding this, the French papers contrived now and again during the first couple of months to publish scraps of news calculated to convey to the public a faint notion of the proceedings, until one day a nationalist organ boldly announced that the British premier had disagreed with the expert commission and with his own colleagues on the subject of Danzig and refused to give way. This paragraph irritated the British statesman, who made a scene at the next meeting of the council.

There is—

He is reported to have exclaimed—

some one among us who is unmindful of his obligations.

And while uttering these and other much stronger words he eyed severely a certain mild individual, who is said to have trembled all over during the philippic. He also launched out into a violent diatribe against various French journals which had criticized his views on Poland and his method of carrying them in council, and he went so far as to threaten to have the conference transferred to a neutral country.

On page 107 the author says:

> No secretaries were admitted to its gatherings—

That is, the council of five—> and no official minutes of its proceedings were recorded. Communications were never issued to the press. It resembled a gang of benevolent conspirators whose debates and resolutions were swallowed up by darkness and mystery. Even the most modest meeting of a provincial taxpayers' association keeps minutes of its discussions. The world parliament kept none. Eschewing traditional usages, as became naive shapers of the new world, and ignoring history, the five, four, or three shut themselves up in a room, talked informally and disconnectedly without a common principle, program, or method, and separated again without having reached a conclusion.

Then he gives illustrations. These paragraphs not only have their bearing upon the things which have gone by but they bear also upon the present situation. A few days ago, February 11, the council of the League of Nations met in London. The first step taken after that body of distinguished men met was to close the doors and to proceed absolutely in secrecy. They have now established a precedent that the body to which we are supposed to send a representative, and I presume to which we are supposed to send delegates, being a body representing different nations, if the same rule applies, will be carrying on its business from time to time in the utmost secrecy. That which is a quasi legislative body, a judicial body, a body which represents the most vital interests of our people and of other peoples, has initiated its historic beginning by establishing the same secrecy which prevailed at Versailles.

In my opinion, Mr. President, the rule which they invoked at Versailles and the reason why they invoked it will apply just as thoroughly to every meeting of the council. The reason why they invoked it was because they said they were dealing with the affairs of different nations, that discussions would lead to bitterness, to estrangement, and to ill-feeling. That rule will apply throughout the history of the league. So we are facing the proposition, Mr. President, of sending to Europe to sit in that conclave our representatives upon whom the doors will be closed just as completely as they were closed upon our representatives at Versailles. Not only did we disregard the rule with reference to "open covenants openly arrived at" at Versailles, but we have established a system which is to be based upon secrecy throughout its entire life. This league was born in secrecy, and it is to continue its business in secrecy. Here is a body of men whom the people can neither select, elect, or recall sitting in secret in one of the courts of Europe and dealing with matters involving the lives of millions. Could autocracy go further! It is little wonder that the common people of Europe are everywhere turning against the whole scheme, as Dr. Dillon so graphically demonstrates.

Mr. LODGE. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, I move that the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 18, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 17, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Imbue us, we beseech Thee, our Father in heaven, with grace sufficient unto the needs of the hour, that these Thy servants may move forward to the tasks before them with clear perceptions, pure ideals, and unbiased minds, that their work may be to the good of our people and thus in harmony with Thy will. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. VINSON, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. CRISP), was granted leave of absence from Saturday indefinitely on account of illness.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, House bill of the following title, with Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

H. R. 11927. An act to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Richmond, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8819) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. SHEPPARD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE SEDITION LAW.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from the editor of the Toledo News-Bee, one of the largest circulating independent journals in northern Ohio, relating to the sedition bills now before Congress. This letter is short and terse and illuminating. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to print it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter to which he refers. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object, inasmuch as the request comes from the distinguished gentleman from Ohio—I wish to say that I could offer many letters from many other editors of many other prominent newspapers who are in favor of a proper sedition bill being passed in order to rid this country of anarchy. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

THE TOLEDO NEWS-BEE,
Toledo, Ohio, February 10, 1920.

Gen. I. R. SHERWOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I have just read a communication from Attorney General Palmer to Chairman CAMPBELL, of the Committee on Rules, in which he acknowledges authorship of the bill introduced by Representative DAVEY, of Ohio, "defining sedition, the promoting thereof, providing punishment therefor, etc."

Defining sedition, the Davey bill says:

"Whoever, with the intent to levy war against the United States or to cause the change, overthrow, or destruction of the Government, or of any of the laws or authority thereof, or to cause the overthrow or destruction of all forms of law or organized government, or to oppose, prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any of the laws of the United States, or the free performance by the United States Government of any of its officers, agents, or employees of its or his public duty, commits or attempts or threatens to commit any act of force against any person or any property, or any act of terrorism, hate, revenge, or injury against the person or property of any officer, agent, or employee of the United States, shall be deemed guilty of sedition," etc.

By confining this definition of sedition to one of its causes, it would read as follows:

"Whoever, with the intent * * * to cause the change, overthrow, or destruction of the Government or any of the laws or authority thereof, * * * or to oppose, prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States, or the free performance by the United States Government or any one of its officers, agents, or employees of its or his public duty, commits, or attempts or threatens to commit, any act of force against any person or any property of any officer, agent, or employee of the United States, shall be guilty of sedition," etc.

Then section 2 says that—

"Whoever makes, displays, writes, prints, or circulates, or knowingly aids or abets the making, displaying, writing, printing, or circulating of, any sign, word, speech, picture, design, argument, or teaching which advises, advocates, teaches, or justifies any act of sedition as hereinbefore defined, or organizes, or assists, or joins in the organization of, or becomes or remains a member of, or affiliated with, any society or organization, whether the same be formally organized or not, which has for its object, in whole or in part, the advising, advocating, teaching, or justifying of any act of sedition as hereinbefore defined, shall be deemed guilty of promoting sedition," etc.

This bill is prepared by Attorney General Palmer and introduced in Congress at a time when the public mind is centered on an antired campaign that borders on hysteria. At the same time, efforts are being made in Congress to secure legislation that would make it a crime for workingmen to strike. Also at a time when the Government is about to enforce the Volstead Act.

I cite these facts to illustrate the use that might be made of the proposed sedition law, in the hands of the legal department of the Government, with a fanatical Puritan at its head.

My own belief is that much of the antired hysteria is camouflage, and that the real purpose of such laws is to crush organized labor, to destroy the right of collective bargaining, and to strengthen the arm of the Anti-Saloon League, which comes mighty near being to-day the real Government of the United States.

You can see how even accidental force or violence in a labor disturbance, or even in political excitement during a campaign to change obnoxious laws, might result in prosecution and conviction for sedition. Or how assault and battery by one or a few excited individuals might lead to the prosecution and persecution of hundreds of innocent members of an organization because they had advocated the change of some law.

It is not necessary to go into all the particulars of how such a law might lead to the most outrageous tyranny and injustice. The danger stands out all through the bill.

To all intents and purposes the Anti-Saloon League to-day is a holding company for both old political parties. It has terrorized politicians and the press. It has resulted in mediocre Congresses and State legislatures by making the supreme test of a legislator's fitness either his wetness or his dryness. In this particular the booze traffic is quite as selfish and tyrannical as the dry machine, for in dependable wet districts all that was required of a legislator was that he be dependably wet, and in dry districts that he be dependably dry. Anyhow, I am not concerned here about the controversy between the wets and drys. I am more concerned about the larger matter of real democracy and liberty. And I consider these so-called sedition bills as a real menace to liberty.

There is another phase of the general situation to which I invite your attention. Consider first the fact that the Anti-Saloon League is the cleverest, shrewdest, and most efficient political machine ever built up in this country. Then consider this fact: Quite recently 880 Protestant preachers of up-State New York issued an address to the Protestant preachers of New York City, in which they scolded the New York City preachers for not doing their duty toward maintaining the Anti-Saloon League as "the agency of all the churches of State and Nation." Of the 880 up-State preachers, 421 were Methodists (the church in which I was born and raised), and next in strength came the Baptists and Presbyterians.

I do not question the perfect right of all of them to advocate and fight for prohibition, nor their right to insist on enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. I am merely dealing with political tendencies that may have to do with our larger liberties. And I suggest that if the Anti-Saloon League, with all its vast power, is the political arm of the organized evangelical churches, and at the same time controls the church organization, then we have in effect a combination of church and State in control of Government, and that combination always has been, and always will be, a menace to liberty, no matter what church it happens to be.

Isn't it about time somebody had the intelligence, the love of liberty, and the guts to stand up in Congress and fight for liberty—for the return to the real meaning of our constitutional guarantees—for the Democracy of Thomas Jefferson?

Sincerely,

N. D. COCHRAN.

REFERENCE OF NAVY PAY BILL.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill H. R. 11927, the Navy pay bill, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. That will be done under the rule.

FRANCES C. PADGETT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts I ask for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Accounts submits a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 437.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Frances C. Padgett, widow of William L. Padgett, late an employee of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months of his compensation as such employee, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the expenses of the funeral of said William L. Padgett.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, in offering this resolution I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that if it receives favorable action the House will be setting a precedent. Under the present arrangement the committee had no alternative save to regard the clerks to Members of the House as employees of the House, since they are now on the roll. The beneficiary in this instance is the widow of the former clerk of the Committee on Naval Affairs and later the secretary or clerk to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. It is a clearly defined case. We have had only one other coming to the committee since the new arrangement as to clerks. This is in all points legitimate, in the mind of the committee, and we had no alternative under the conditions save to take the course we did in recommending favorable action.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. What is the precedent where the clerk should happen to be unmarried?

Mr. IRELAND. It would go to the administrator of his estate or executor—the legal representative of his estate. There is no precedent in this instance. I have another resolution to offer, something on that order.

Mr. WALSH. Do you allow the funeral expenses in a case where the clerk dies unmarried?

Mr. IRELAND. We never have allowed them to any clerk in the past, but now they can not but be regarded as employees of the House and placed on the same basis as any other employee—a doorkeeper or a janitor or those serving in similar positions. And that has been the custom in the past as to the latter employees.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield a moment to me?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am on the Committee on Accounts, and I wanted to supplement what the chairman has said. Now, in answer to the inquiry or suggestion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the committee had decided that where there are no direct dependents the amount would not be paid in any case, and we wanted to establish that as a precedent, and I thought that the chairman ought to call the attention of the House to that. Now, if there is any employee of the House on the roll that has dependents, then the precedent we have heretofore followed in Congress unanimously, allowing six months' pay and funeral expenses, would be followed, and that would follow with reference to clerks of Members who are placed on the roll and who are employees. In other words, we place them in the same position as we do other employees here. But it is agreed by the committee that it would not recommend for anyone, either for clerks to Members or other employees of the House, to pay the six months' pay to the administrator or anybody else, unless they had dependents. In other words, if an employee were a single person and had no direct dependents, then we would pay nothing but the funeral expenses, and not the six months' allowance.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield, so that I may ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Oklahoma understands that the clerks of the Members of the House are now in existence by virtue of a temporary law, one that is not permanent. I mean by that that on a point of order raised when the next legislative bill is under consideration, it would go out, if any Member of the 435 Members desires to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What item?

Mr. GARNER. The item providing for clerk hire. And the result will be that the present law will authorize $1,200, whereas under the present arrangement there is a provision for $3,200 for clerk hire. Now, I want merely to suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma and his colleague that this will not be considered as a precedent for relatives of clerks of Members provided these clerks are not on the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly not.

Mr. GARNER. I am merely calling the attention of the gentleman to that. When you come back to the original law as it exists now, the law on the statute books authorizing clerk hire, you find it is $1,200 a year, and the persons employed are not on the roll under the present law. But under the provision carried in the last bill there is a provision for $3,200 for them, provided they go on the roll.

Mr. WALSH. May I ask the gentleman whether that was not done by resolution?

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that in my opinion that is permanent law.

Mr. GARNER. I do not understand that it is permanent law.

Mr. IRELAND. Does not the gentleman from Texas regard them as employees of the House under the present arrangement?

Mr. GARNER. They are. I think the gentleman is correct. But if it is merely an allowance to the membership for clerk hire and they are not on the roll their dependents would not be entitled to this.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the gentleman from Texas is becoming unduly excited about this. I have no doubt this will be made permanent law, and when that time comes I am sure the Committee on Accounts will follow the precedent that is established.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I want to ask the gentleman what annual compensation was this clerk receiving and what amount will this resolution entail?

Mr. IRELAND. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BLACK. It would have something to do with the amount. I understand it is six months' pay.

Mr. IRELAND. It is determined by the figure at which he was on the roll. I can not from memory tell the gentleman, although I had a memorandum of the amount in the committee.

Mr. BLACK. Under the present arrangement some Members have one clerk and some have two. Some Members will have a clerk on the roll at $3,000 and another will have a clerk on the roll at $2,000. In the event of the death of one who has dependents, under an arrangement of this kind the dependents in one case would get $1,500, six months' pay, and the dependents in the other case would get only $1,000, or one-half of $2,000. When the bill was before the House I endeavored by an amendment to fix the salary of a clerk to a Member at a flat $2,000 and then allow the maximum amount of the other clerk to be $1,200. Under the other arrangement there is no uniformity at all.

Mr. IRELAND. That is probably true.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no uniformity now. The committee has just followed the precedent established for many years in the House.

Mr. BLACK. That is to pay different employees of the same class.

Mr. HASTINGS. Whatever the employees get, their dependents are paid six months, whether it be much or little, whether $50 a month or $250.

Mr. BLACK. The point I want to emphasize is this: For instance, the stenographers of the House receive the same pay, and if they should die their dependents would receive the same compensation; but under the law that we passed in the House there is a widely different range of salaries, and I think we ought to amend the law and make these secretaries receive the same pay or a uniform salary.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the beneficiary in this case the widow of a deceased clerk?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the resolution make the money payable to the widow?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman to say it was to go to the estate.

Mr. IRELAND. If I said so, it was in error. It is the widow.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Under the new arrangement, is it a fact that this particular clerk is held to be a House employee under the rules of the House?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. And therefore these rulings to which we have adhered in cases of death apply to this case?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir; and I think that was the thought of the committee, and, I think, unanimously.

Mr. GARD. Persons in this class are appointed, and this man, I think, was appointed by the Representative in Congress. They are House employees only in the sense that they are on the rolls of the House.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; but is not that sufficient?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is exactly the point that occurred to me when this original legislation was on its passage, that if we ever consented that our secretaries and office employees should go on the rolls of the House, we by that much lost our jurisdiction over them as personal employees, in the sense and character originally intended, answerable to us and to our district. By that legislation they came on the way of eventually getting into the civil-service scheme and become gradually lost as a part of the public-office, public-patronage jobs, and the next step would be, instead of appointing them ourselves, they would have to take an examination, and some one else would appoint them for us.

Mr. IRELAND. The House alone is responsible, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. I shall not object to the small amount of money involved in this case, which is probably an extreme case, but there is much in the contention of establishing a precedent here as to whether persons in this class are House employees or personal employees. My contention is that one's secretaries or employees in one's office are his personal employees, and that the House has no control over them and should not have any control over them. If putting them on the roll is sufficient to take them out of the personal-employees class and make them employees of the House, it should be so understood.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; but their compensation is payable directly to the clerk and not to the Members. Probably the preponderance of the evidence proves they are employees of the House.

Mr. GARD. I do not think so. I do not think they should be, at least.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Are there any precedents in regard to the payment of this amount to clerks of committees? Of course we have had clerks of committees for a great many years. It would seem very singular if none had ever died while Congress was in session.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that for several years—I have forgotten when the habit began—when one of these clerks died his widow or dependent got half a year's compensation?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I made the inquiry as to whether there are any precedents to that effect. I do not recall. But the clerks to Members under existing law come within about the same purview as the clerks to the committees. The clerks to committees were never appointed by the House. They were appointed by the chairmen of the committees. It is true that under the rules of the House a committee could override a chairman, although I think that never was done. When I was chairman I never consulted the committee about the appointment of a clerk.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not recall myself, but I recollect that when Mr. Courts, the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, died, did we not appropriate something?

Mr. GARD. We did.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was not here at the time. The gentleman from Ohio says we did. Certainly it was proper that we should have.

Mr. MADDEN. In the case of Mr. Courts, late clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, a year's salary was given.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me to follow what he has just said, the relations of a clerk to a committee are more naturally toward the organization of the House itself, but the relations of a clerk to a Member are peculiarly and exclusively personal, and the relation of both of them is to the district from which they come.

Mr. KITCHIN. But under the joint resolution passed in the last session the clerks to Members go on the pay roll and they become employees of the House.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that is a technicality which once admitted we put it out of our hands to have the opportunity to recover our personal control and our personal relationship.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not at all, because the resolution provides that the Member may remove his clerk at any time. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we ought to have a law on this subject. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] called attention to the fact that there is no law, and this should impress us with the fact that we ought to have a law carrying out in substance the joint resolution passed at the last session.

The joint resolution of July 11, 1919, simply purported to control the appropriation made in the preceding legislative appropriation bill. That joint resolution reads:

That the appropriation in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 1, 1919, for clerk hire for Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners may be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to two persons to be designated by each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, the names of such persons to be placed on the roll of the employees of the House—

And so forth.

Showing that that joint resolution applied only to that legislative act, which appropriated $3,200 for clerk hire for each Member. So this impresses me with the fact that the House ought really to have a law on the statute books defining what the clerks should be, what they should get, and what appropriation we should make; and I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] that his committee prepare a bill and submit it to the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Committee on Accounts has no jurisdiction over such a bill as that. Such jurisdiction belongs to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KITCHIN. That committee has jurisdiction of appropriations only. I suggest that the Committee on Accounts take it up and give the House something to work on.

Mr. IRELAND. We have such a bill prepared.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that since we abolished the Committee on Acoustics there is no committee of the House which under the rules would have jurisdiction of that matter. I do not know whether the Committee on Acoustics would have had or not.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the Committee on Accounts can assume that jurisdiction and no other committee will try to take it away from it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Illinois will introduce a bill embodying the suggestions of the gentleman from North Carolina, the Speaker will have to refer that bill to some committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I suppose so, and that would give the committee jurisdiction, but the main trouble in the past about this matter has been the fact that it has come before the House in an appropriation bill, the Committee on Appropriations not having jurisdiction of legislative matters, and no other committee of the House having jurisdiction of this matter under the rules, so that no one has paid any attention to it. If somebody introduces such a bill, the Speaker will have to refer it.

Mr. GARNER. If some gentleman makes a point of order against this item in the legislative bill, I think the simplest way to get at it is for the Appropriations Committee to draw a proper legislative provision and let the Rules Committee bring in a rule making it in order, and let every man take his responsibility then as to voting for that particular provision in the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think any Member of the House will object to the Committee on Accounts taking jurisdiction. My opinion is that it would be better for that committee to take jurisdiction rather than the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. MADDEN. They are very liberal.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If they bring out a bill they will probably have to get a special rule in order to get it considered. It might be reached after a while.

Mr. KITCHIN. While the Committee on Rules are not as active or diligent as they ought to be, I think they would give a special rule for it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What delights me is to have my Democratic friends urge that matters be brought before the House by special rule.

Mr. KITCHIN. Nor do I think anyone would object to a unanimous request to consider such a bill. I do not want to reflect on the Committee on Rules, but I must say it does seem to me that they are mighty dull of comprehension. They do not seem to understand the plainest, simplest bills before them.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then why do you want them to pass upon these matters?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to urge them now to attend to their business more diligently. For instance, the Ways and Means Committee unanimously reported out a bill to appropriate $50,000,000, being the profits that the Grain Corporation made in selling wheat to Europe—to appropriate that $50,000,000 for the relief of the starving people in Austria and Armenia.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously certified to the profit which they said was made?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Ways and Means Committee of course did not certify to that, but we had the evidence of the Treasury Department and of Mr. Hoover.

Mr. MADDEN. What evidence did the committee have; just a statement of somebody?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just the statement of Mr. Hoover and of the Treasury Department, which was the best evidence we could get, and all that was necessary, that the Grain Corporation had a profit of $50,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask a further question.

Mr. IRELAND. This has very little to do with the question under consideration. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. This is all out of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want the Committee on Rules to report out a rule making that bill in order, but they will not consider it.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. IRELAND) there were—ayes 116, noes 13.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

SPECIAL EMPLOYEE OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 325.

Resolved, That the salary of one special employee of the House be $1,800 per annum: Provided, That the said salary be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that that is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. IRELAND. Why?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. IRELAND. This has to do with one of the doorkeepers that has been employed in the House a great many years, and was, I believe, through a special act put on the roll. He is at present drawing a compensation of $1,500. This increases his salary $300 and makes it $1,800.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Why does not the resolution name the employee? Why is it so indefinite?

Mr. IRELAND. The resolution was passed last November when I had been called home on a sad mission, and I can not give the gentleman the information.

Mr. DOWELL. It seems to me that as the resolution reads it could apply to anyone. I think it ought to be specific, so that we would know where it applied.

Mr. IRELAND. I think so, too, but the committee did not amend it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It seems to me that instead of naming the employee it should name the position.

Mr. DOWELL. That is what I mean.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It does name the position—a special employee. Is this a minority employee?

Mr. IRELAND. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If it was I should be perfectly willing to pay what is necessary. The resolution is not privileged. The Committee on Accounts does not have jurisdiction to fix the salary of employees. It can not report a privileged resolution fixing a salary. The Committee on Accounts could provide that there should be a certain amount paid out of the contingent fund, which would increase the salary of this employee. Automatically, under the rules of the House, that would authorize the Committee on Appropriations to provide an appropriation at an increased salary. But this is legislation; it fixes the salary of the employee at $1,800 and is not privileged. Who is the employee?

Mr. IRELAND. George Jenison.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He has been here ever since the Republicans came in in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. What is the salary of the other doorkeepers?

Mr. IRELAND. They may not all be drawing the same, but I think it is $1,800.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Do not some get $1,500?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. They also get the bonus.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. I want to say that I am not responsible for the phraseology of the resolution.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered now.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that the resolution is not privileged. The Chair sustains the point of order.

JAMES CLARK.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 305.

Resolved, That James Clark be appointed special messenger to serve in and about the House, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, at a salary of $125 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Clearly the resolution is a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. As I caught the reading of the resolution, it provides by legislation for a new position, naming the incumbent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it provides for a new position, naming the incumbent, the compensation to be payable out of the contingent fund of the House, which is the very purpose of the Committee on Accounts. They have the right to bring in resolutions of that kind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts raises the question of consideration.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the House divided, and there were 126 ayes and 5 noes.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 318, nays 8, answered "present" 3, not voting 99, as follows:

YEAS—318.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Was this resolution presented at the request of the minority side of the House? Has it the approval of the minority leader?

Mr. IRELAND. I think so; I am positive.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is to give an additional minority employee of the House?

Mr. IRELAND. That is the purpose of it; yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I take it that the minority now have the same number of employees which the Republican minority had when the Democrats were in control of the House. Now, what reason is there for an additional minority employee? I hope some minority Member will give us the information.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will yield.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that this gives the minority of this Congress exactly the number which the minority had in the last four Congresses under such a resolution, except for two Congresses, the Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth, the minority had one more than this resolution gives. When the Democrats came in, they found two gentlemen on the roll under a resolution similar to this—Mr. Jennison and Mr. Chauncey, as I remember. The Democrats kept them on under that resolution. They have been here for some time. We knew they were Republicans, but we felt that we ought not to put them out.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, neither Mr. Jennison nor Mr. Chauncey was a minority employee of the House. They never were under the jurisdiction in any way whatever of the minority leader of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Nor will Mr. Clark be under the jurisdiction of the minority leader, but under the jurisdiction of the House, just as Mr. Jennison and Mr. Chauncey were. This resolution, as I understand it—I never looked at it—is in exactly the same language as the resolution under which Mr. George Jennison was appointed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know Mr. George Jennison was appointed as a special employee of the House by resolution appointing him as a special employee or providing for a special employee—I do not remember now—as far back as the Fifty-fourth Congress. That is before I was a Member of the House; and under the rulings of the Chair allowing the Committee on Appropriations to make appropriations for special employees an appropriation for years was made to pay the special employee named in the resolution of a certain date, and he stayed on during the Republican rule in the House. When the Democrats came in they never discovered there was such a place, and I did not call it to their attention, but saw to it that the appropriation was made. Now he is kept as Doorkeeper; nobody was opposed to it. Mr. Chauncey was kept here because he had been here 50 years under both Republican and Democratic rule—was not charged to the minority. Now, I am perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, always to give the minority all the employees it wants, and I thought, to be frank with you, when I was the minority leader that I had all the minority employees that the minority could well make use of. Now you want more.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, will the gentleman just let me make a statement? The gentleman does not exactly know all that the Democrats knew when they got control of the House in 1910. The Democrats knew Mr. George Jennison, a life-long Republican, held a place under a resolution, and they knew that Mr. Chauncey, a life-long Republican, held a place until he died, under a resolution. Let me tell the gentleman the facts. When we first organized the House, when we got control in the Sixty-second Congress, I asked Mr. UNDERWOOD to call the Ways and Means Committee together, which was the organization committee of the Democrats, to consider the status of Mr. Jennison and Mr. Chauncey. I told the committee about these two old employees. I told it that they were Republicans and that they had been here so long that it would seem cruel to turn them out or to stop the appropriations, and I got a resolution through the Ways and Means Committee appointing me a committee of one to go to the patronage committee, consisting of Dr. FOSTER, Mr.

HUMPHREYS, and Mr. DOREMUS, and insist to them upon not considering those two places as patronage for distribution, and to recommend to the caucus the continuance on the rolls of those two gentlemen. I went before the patronage committee in behalf of Mr. Jennison and Mr. Chauncey. They were kept on the rolls. I then went to the Committee on Appropriations in that Congress in their behalf. Mr. Jennison remembers, and every year while the Democrats had control of the House I went in person to the chairman and asked him to take care of the appropriation for them until Mr. Chauncey died, and thereafter every year in behalf of the appropriation for Mr. Jennison. Now, these are the facts about it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, I went to the Committee on Appropriations, too, and the Committee on Appropriations in this matter follow in their appropriations the appropriations of the preceding year as far as the employees of the House are concerned. Now, Mr. Jennison was a good employee of the House and was no older an employee than a large number of the other employees of the House when the Democrats came in. Very many of them had been here since the Fifty-fourth Congress. Mr. Chauncey was an employee of the House for 50 years, under both Republican and Democratic rule——

Mr. KITCHIN. And I saw to it that he was kept in the manner I have explained.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Democrats did not know, and I think nobody else knew. What is this employee for? I may say to the gentleman we have kept a Democratic employee of the House as a reading clerk, and I suppose having done that if we come in again after a while somebody will say we ought to have three reading clerks because we kept a Democratic employee.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say this: That as I understand it—and I am pretty certain it is true, because I have been told it is—this resolution is in the exact form under which Mr. Jennison got his place and held it and the resolution under which Mr. Chauncey held his place until he died. Now, they were both Republicans. Mr. Clark has been in the employ of the House for 8 or 10 years when the Democrats were in. It is now asked that the Republicans of the House put and keep Mr. Clark in under the identical kind of resolution under which the Democrats kept two Republicans in. I think we should have some comity between this side and that and let this resolution pass.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman knows how I feel about it. The gentleman says it is the same form of resolution. That has nothing to do with it. It is the same form of resolution that provides for——

Mr. KITCHIN. If we keep Mr. Jennison, and we should keep him, we can put this Mr. Clark on, and he would not be a minority employee controlled by the minority, but a House employee, like Mr. Jennison.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is the form of resolution under which the present minority employees of the House are employed.

Mr. KITCHIN. But they are given to the minority as such and controlled by the minority.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is what we want to get at. So far as the majority side of the House is concerned, I doubt very much whether they need the services of Mr. Clark.

Mr. KITCHIN. We knew that we did not need actually the services of Mr. Jennison or Mr. Chauncey, but we kept them on, and their services were rendered to the House, not to the majority or to the minority.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the gentleman seeks to say that the minority does not need his services, but wants to charge him to us.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not say that. He will be a House employee, not named by the minority, not controlled by the minority, not serving the minority, but, like Mr. Jennison, controlled by the House and serving the entire House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They are all under the control of somebody.

Mr. KITCHIN. But the others are given to the minority, and the minority controls them.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This resolution will remain the resolution of the House not merely until the end of this Congress but until the end of time, unless it is repealed by the recipient himself.

Mr. KITCHIN. So with Mr. Jennison and so with Mr. Chauncey. It can only be binding on this Congress. Each Congress must act on it on the appropriation. And we can repeal it at any time we desire. This Congress can stop the appropriation at any time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman from Illinois understands that the two gentlemen just named are not the only Republicans that were kept in the organization. There were numbers of them.

Mr. KITCHIN. We kept five or more Republicans in. I do not recall all now; Mr. Sabine is one.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The illustration given by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that those were kept in is given only to fool those who do not know. It does not fool me.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman deny what I stated about going to the committee and getting the committee to make an appropriation for them?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It certainly would be far from me to deny any statement of fact which the gentleman makes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I want to say this, that the Republicans have done it and the Democrats did it in recent years when they controlled the House. We kept quite a number of Republicans on the roll.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would have been wiser had you kept more of them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not say that to influence gentlemen in this particular instance. We had Mr. Grayson and Mr. Sabine and Mr. Cook and a number of them.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand you had a number kept on. Do you remember any instance where you by special resolution named a Republican employee of the House during your eight years of administration?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, we named minority employees.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I offered the resolution for that. But this is not to appoint a minority employee.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. We created an additional place, at the earnest request of the Republican side, in the cloak room, to look after the telephones, at a salary of $1,500. The gentleman understands that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. My recollection is that there were two pair clerks on that side and one on this side.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes. We had two pair clerks and you had one, theoretically. They were minority employees, and you have the same now.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. We do not have them now, but we hope to have them in the future.

Mr. KITCHIN. This report was unanimous, and it was also unanimous in giving the Sergeant at Arms an extra man two or three months ago.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Who is this Mr. Clark that is mentioned? Is he the gentleman that served in the Members Gallery for so long?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. KING. I do not know what his politics are, but I know he is the best man that has ever been up in the gallery. He has been courteous and kind and efficient to the Members' wives and their relatives, and others, and everyone of them, so far as I have had converse with them, would like to see this old gentleman have his place back, and I think it is fair and square that he should have it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.
